PREFACE TO THE HEXHAM HISTORIANS.

§ 1. Two priors of the Augustinian priory of St. Andrew's, of Hexham, in the county of Northumberland, have written continuations of the chronicle of Simeon of Durham. Translations of these are embodied in the present volume.

§ 2. "The History of the Church of Hexham, by John the prior," embraces a period of twenty-five years, namely, from A. D. 1130 to 1154, both inclusive. We have no distinct indication as to the exact period at which it was written; but there appears to be reason for concluding that it was penned shortly after the death of king Stephen, and, consequently, that the events which it records are the impressions of a contemporary author. As might naturally be expected, the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of the north of England claim a prominent part in these pages. The earlier portion is inferior in historical interest to the latter, and exhibits frequent traces of compilation from existing sources, constantly blended, however, with original notices of events, connected chiefly with the dioceses of York, Durham, and Carlisle, in all of which the monastery of Hexham had endowments. From the year 1139 the work increases in value, and from that point its narrative may be accepted as an independent authority. Its chronology, however, towards the end, is confused and faulty; but whether this arises from want of precision on the part of the copyist, or the author, is not clear.

§ 3. Only one manuscript copy of this work is known, which is preserved in the library of archbishop Parker, at Corpus Christi College, in Cambridge, No. cxxxix. From this source it was printed by Twysden in his Decem Scriptorum (col. 257—282), the text of which edition, the only one which has yet appeared, forms the basis of our translation.

§ 4. Of greater value is the "History of the Acts of king Stephen, and the Battle of the Standard," by Richard,¹ prior of Hexham. It extends from A. D. 1135 to 1139, both inclusive; and is occupied chiefly with an account of the irruptions of the Scots, under king David, into the northern districts of England, of which it gives some painful details. Its Hexham origin is frequently perceptible (pp. 43, 44, 52), and the information which it affords is valuable, as the contemporaneous narrative of a well-informed historian.

§ 5. One only manuscript copy of this chronicle remains, that, namely, in the library of Corpus College, to which reference has already been made, and to which we are indebted for so many important documents connected with the north of England. Twysden's edition is the only copy of the Latin text, and from that source it has here been translated.

PREFACE TO THE CHRONICLE OF HOLYROOD.

§ 1. Simeon of Durham, and his Hexham continuators, present us with a history of the ecclesiastical affairs of the northern districts of the kingdom, as seen from an English point of view; but the two following chronicles, the productions of Scottish authors—who may be presumed to have written under the influence of prejudices and feelings not always in unison with those of their southern neighbours—have a claim upon our attention.

§ 2. "The Chronicle of Holyrood," near Edinburgh, (an ecclesiastical establishment belonging to the Canons Regular of St. Augustine,) extends from the birth of our Saviour to the year 1163, at which point it ends abruptly and imperfectly. It consists of two parts, easily distinguishable from each other; the earlier portion, as far as the year 731, is to be referred chiefly to the historical writings of the venerable Beda.¹ No entries occur from 734 to 1065. The second portion of this chronicle, however, from 1065 until its conclusion in 1163, is very valuable, affording us important information upon the ecclesiastical history of northern England, and the Lothians of Scotland.

§ 3. The only existing manuscript of this chronicle is preserved in the library of Lambeth Palace, in which collection it is numbered 440. It is a small quarto, written upon vellum, in a hand of the twelfth century, which has transcribed the entire chronicle, but which, by degrees, becomes a little larger, and more careless towards the end. On the second leaf, and in a hand of the thirteenth century, is this inscription: "Liber Sanctæ Mariæ de S. Servano,² ex dono Willelmi filii Dunecani, personæ ipsius ecclesiæ."

§ 4. In 1691, Henry Wharton published this chronicle, under the title of the "Chronicon Sanctæ Crucis," in his Anglia Sacra (i. 152—162), with the omission, however, of the passages anterior to A. D. 596. A second and more complete edition has recently been printed by Robert Pitcairn, Esq., for private circulation among the members of the Bannatyne club of Edinburgh. The present translation is from Wharton's text, completed and corrected by a collation with the original manuscript.

² There was a parish of St. Serf in Perthshire, within the diocese of Dunkeld, which possibly may be the locality here designated. See "An alphabetical table of all the parishes in Scotland," printed with Keith's Scottish Bishops, p. 360, ed. 1824.

PREFACE TO THE CHRONICLE OF MELROSE.

§ 1. Amongst the scanty documents illustrative of the early history of Scotland which have reached us, a distinguished rank is to be assigned to the chronicle of Melrose. The chronicle of Holyrood, which alone can compete with it in antiquity, is inferior in detail as well as in extent; and its age gives it an undisputed advantage over the writings of Fordun, Wyntoun, Barbour, and Bower. The era, as well as the locality, of its composition places it above the chronicles of Hemingford, Gray, and that of the monks of Lanercost, how valuable soever these annals may be in the illustration of the later periods of our history. It is to the pages of this chronicle alone that we must advert for the general history of Scotland during several reigns, as narrated by Scotchmen; and, excepting the brief notices of the chronicle of Holyrood, we have no other contemporaneous annalist until we arrive at Barbour and Fordun, both of whom wrote about a century after the abrupt termination of the chronicle of Melrose.

§ 2. The present translation is founded upon the authority of the Cottonian manuscript, Faustina, B. ix. It was once a question of extreme importance whether that manuscript be an unique copy, or whether the text which it supplies might not be corrected or augmented by other manuscripts of equal value. It may now be affirmed, without hesitation, that no other early copy exists. There is none in the British Museum, nor is any indicated in the extensive Catalogus Manuscriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ, nor in the more recent lists of the libraries at Lambeth, Stow, or Durham, or in the general catalogues of manuscripts compiled by Montfaucon and Haenel. And yet, on the other hand, the writers at the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, would induce us to suppose that manuscripts existed in Scotland which exhibited considerable and important variations from the text published by Gale and Fell from the Cottonian copy. It is asserted by Sir George Mackenzie,¹ that "certainly that English manuscript is very unfaithful, for most of the things relating to our nation are omitted, as particularly about the beginning, in the year 844. Our manuscript observes (which the English has not), that Alpin king of the Scots died, to whom succeeded his son Kenneth, who beat the Picts, and was declared first king of all Scotland, to the water of Tine; and after it expresses in his epitaph,

*Primus in Albaia fertur regnasse Kenedhus,
Filius Alpini, proelia multa gerens.*²

And it observes that he was called the first king of Albany, not because he was the first who made the Scottish laws, but because he was the first king of all Scotland." In a subsequent page of the same work, he says, "I reflect not on the publishers of the manuscript of the abbacy of Melros, printed at Oxford, for I honour every thing that comes from that learned society in a special manner; but it is no reflection on them to say that we have another much fuller in what makes for Scotland, although it could not be so exact as the other monasteries, since it was oftentimes of old under the Saxons, who would certainly lessen what relates to us. And thus the fault lay in the copy, and not in the publishers; for the author of that manuscript calls Bede our countryman, so he must have been then our enemy; but, however, it begins not with Alpin, as the Doctor alleges, though I mention that because he is not mentioned in the Oxford edition. It declares that it is to continue where the reverend Bede left, and so it is a proof of our nation and history for that time, and the differences of that shall be printed."¹

² Sir James Dalrymple, who cites the same lines, refers for them to a manuscript at Edinburgh. Collections, p. 90.

§ 3. Sir James Dalrymple tells us that he will not be at the pains to compare the Oxford edition with the manuscript copies to be found in Scotland or England, but that he will content himself with the printed one.²

§ 4. Nicolson, in his Scottish Historical Library, had done much to perpetuate this belief, and has in other respects obscured the subject by the unguarded, erroneous, and contradictory manner in which he speaks of our Chronicle. The authority, which is generally attached to his work, somewhat undeservedly, renders it necessary to examine his statements, without reverting to those advanced by Mackenzie and Dalrymple, which he incorporates with his own. He agrees with the former of these writers that Gale's text is imperfect; and after quoting the following sentence—"Rex Malcolmus Scotorum, veniens ad regem Angliæ Henricum apud Cestriam, devenit homo suus, eo modo quo avus suus fuerat homo veteris regis Henrici, salvis omnibus dignitatibus suis"—he adds, "Nor is this matter taken notice of in the Oxford edition, but only in the manuscript copy which they have in Scotland." Strange to say, these very words are to be found in the Oxford edition.³ Yet one of his subsequent observations seems intended to prove that the Scottish copies are less copious than the decried English edition, for he tells us that all "these manuscript copies in Scotland⁴ end with the words 'Obiit Adam de Kilcontath [l. Kilconcath] comes de Karryc in Actonia [l. Acconia], cujus uxorem [Diuam nomine]"

³ P. 169.

⁴ Two copies are mentioned in the first volume of the catalogue of the Advocate's Library; and Haenel, col. 785, indicates one as in the collection of the University of Glasgow. This last the Editor had an opportunity of examining; it is a small quarto, marked F. vii. 23, formerly belonging to Sir James Balfour, by whom it was transcribed from the original. It ends in the same manner as those mentioned by Nicolson, after which follows the colophon of the transcriber, as given in the text. As it was in the possession of the University in the year 1700, it is not improbable that Nicolson made his memoranda from this copy, when on a visit to his "worthy friend, Mr. Robert Wudrow, library-keeper at Glasgow."

⁵ The words here enclosed within brackets do not exist in the Cottonian manuscript.

comitissam de Karryc, postea junior Robertus de Bruys accepit in sponsam ;” which demonstrates that they contain about two pages less than is given by the Oxford edition. He then adds the colophon appended to these transcripts, which states that “Hæc est vera copia antiquæ Cronicæ de Melros in Scotia, inchoata per abbatem de Dundranan, ab anno 735, continuata per varios ad annum 1270. Autographum extat in Bibliotheca Do. Roberti Cotton, militis, apud Westmonasterium.” He attempts to obscure this clear statement by observing, “Now, though this is said to be a transcript of that in Cotton’s Library, yet he that compares it with the extracts¹ made thence by Mr. Tyrrel, will find them very different ;” and no wonder, since these extracts made by Tyrrel consist only, as has been noted below, of the verses printed at pp. 223-9 of this edition. From this tissue of error, confusion, and contradiction, it is impossible to avoid arriving at the conviction that the celebrated author of the Scottish Historical Library has written his notice of this important chronicle without giving himself the trouble of examining the stability of the arguments upon which rest his theories and assertions.

§ 5. The latest author, as far as the editor is aware, who makes this statement is Spottiswood, who reiterates the assertion that “the Oxford edition published in the year 1684, does not agree with our manuscripts,”² but he supports it by no quotations or other proofs, and in this statement he seems blindly to have followed earlier authorities.

§ 6. It is, therefore, clear that the Cottonian manuscript is the only ancient copy of whose existence we have any proof ; and it is equally clear that the “Scottish MSS.” are mere abridged and recent transcripts from this original.

§ 7. The Oxford edition, although not meriting the character which we have seen has been bestowed upon it, is yet by no means satisfactory. Without intending to derogate from the respect due to the learned editor under whose name the XV. Scriptores pass, it must be owned that this chronicle is there printed in a faulty and imperfect manner. It is an unnecessary, and would be an ungracious task, to specify these defects ; and the apology is of a very dubious character when the conjecture is hazarded that Fulman, the editor of the edition of 1684, followed, as his sole authority, a transcript now preserved at Oxford,³ and that he appears to have had no opportunity of collating this transcript with the original. That this transcript has not undergone a careful revision appears almost certain, for in more than one instance where the copyist had committed an obvious blunder, Fulman, observing the fault, has proposed as a conjectural emendation the very words which stand in the Cottonian original.

§ 8. The author, or rather the authors, of this chronicle cannot now be ascertained. It has hitherto been customary to ascribe its commencement to an abbot of Dundrenan in Galloway, but this is one of the errors into which the faulty transcript perpetuated by the edition of 1684 has led all subsequent writers.¹ The true reading of the memorandum upon which it is founded is as follows:—"Memorandum, quod abbas de Dundraynand mutuavit cronica de Melrose, in quibus fuerunt xiiij. quaterni, folio v^{xx} et xix."² At a subsequent period the abbot procured the loan of the remaining portion, "Abbas de Dundrainan mutuo accepit reliquam partem cronicorum istorum."³ In the first of these quotations the word mutuavit has been mistaken for inchoavit, and hence the origin of that claim upon our gratitude hitherto exercised by the abbot of Dundrenan. In this, as in other investigations of a similar nature, it is much easier to produce negative than positive testimony; and having removed the abbot of Dundrenan from his eminence, the Editor must confess that he is unable to place any other claimant in his stead. Since, however, the dispersion of error is a step, and that not an unimportant one, towards the attainment of truth, a few sentences may be devoted in examining the accuracy of the statements hitherto promulgated as to the authorship, antiquity, etc., of this chronicle, before venturing to make any observations upon these important subjects.

§ 9. Nicolson, Dalrymple, and others, state that it is partly the production of English writers, partly of Scotchmen. The first portion, which they ascribe to an English author, extends, say they, to about the period "when the little convent of Dundrainand was founded;"⁴ in confirmation of which they add that Beda is styled "decus et gloria gentis nostræ."⁵ It might be urged, with great reason, that the writer of that introduction, considering Beda, as he afterwards styles him, "doctor non solum Anglorum verum etiam universæ ecclesiæ," might, without any breach of national feeling, use the words "gentis nostræ;" seeing that the great luminary of the Saxon church, whom he so much admires, and whose labours it was the object of his present employment to continue, was born, spent a long life, and died, within less than a hundred miles of Melrose. But it may rather be remarked, that to adduce such an expression as proof of the English authorship of this part of the chronicle, betrays a forgetfulness of the relative position and circumstances of the two countries when these words were penned. Prior to the bloody wars commenced by Edward the First, and the feelings of enmity which, originating in them, continued to inflame the two nations with mutual hatred to a period comparatively recent, the sovereigns of Northern and Southern Britain were, in general, upon terms of intimacy, if not of friendship; ¹ and however much the expression commented upon, when viewed under the influence of modern prejudices, might seem a proof of an English origin, it would not at first convey any such idea.

§ 10. That the English authorship of this early part of the history may appear the more obvious, Nicolson ² argues that the monastery of Melrose itself seems to have been in the hands of the English, from the fact that Waltheof, brother of Henry, earl of Northumberland, and of Simon, earl of Northampton, in whom he recognises only the scion of a southern family, was made abbot of Melrose; forgetting that his mother, the countess Matilda, ³ became the wife of David, prince of Cumberland, who afterwards ascended the throne of Scotland.

§ 11. The same writer says, ⁴ that "in the year 1157, the abbot of Dundrainan, or some of his countrymen, was most probably the scribe; this being the account which he gives of the Scotch king's homage: Rex Malcolmus Scotorum veniens ad regem Angliæ Henricum apud Cestriam devenit homo suus, eo modo quo avus suus fuerat homo veteris regis Henrici, salvis omnibus dignitatibus suis." Unfortunately, however, for this theory, the passage has been transcribed verbatim from Hoveden. ⁵ He further states that this is not noticed in the Oxford edition, "but only in the manuscript copy which they have in Scotland," whereas the passage is in the Oxford edition. ⁶

§ 12. That the present chronicle is the production of a series of writers who were inmates of Melrose, appears from a variety of passages scattered throughout the following pages, references to a few of which are given in the note below, ⁷ for the purpose of removing the doubt which has recently been expressed, whether the present compilation be indeed the chronicle of Melrose. The diversities of writing which the manuscript presents, will evince that we cannot ascribe its compilation to any individual author; but that a century, at least, must have elapsed between the time when the prologue was written, and that which saw recorded the exploits of prince Edward in the Holy Land.

§ 13. This chronicle naturally resolves into two distinct portions, that, namely, which is a composition from preexisting authorities, and that which may be considered as an original composition. In the earlier portion there occur various passages which have been translated from the Saxon Chronicle, but whether directly from that venerable authority, or through the medium of some other source of information common in the annals ascribed to Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, and our annalist, is by no means clear. There are not wanting arguments which might be adduced to prove that an independent version has been made,¹ some illustrations of which are given in the note below; but in a question of such obscurity, it is not easy to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

§ 14. It is obvious that very much of the earlier portion of these annals is to be referred to Simeon of Durham;² a comparison of the two, at almost any point, will afford abundant illustrations. Hoveden, too, whose history is, for the most part, a repetition of the prior labours of Simeon of Durham, and Henry of Huntingdon, appears to have furnished some of the peculiarities where a departure from the text of Simeon is observable. Even during this early period, there are introduced passages which must be considered original.³ From about the year 1140 to the end, the information of the chronicle may be considered as original, and the numerous and progressive variations in the handwriting show that it is very frequently, if not always, contemporaneous.

§ 15. The chronicle of Melrose became, in its turn, the source from which other chronicles obtained portions of their information. Fordun has followed it in passages without number; of which a very few are indicated in the note below;⁴ and cites it as "quædam

¹ A.D. 782. The notice of the council of Acle is placed by Florence in 781; by Richard of Hexham in 788; Simeon and Hoveden omit the year; the Chron. Melr. agrees with the Saxon.

794. The last sentence in this year adheres closely to the Saxon; Simeon, as usual, is much more diffuse in his narrative; Hoveden differs from both.

797. The sentence concerning pope Leo is a close version of the Saxon; Simeon's narrative, placed under the year 799, is considerably amplified; Florence gives the sense, but in different words, and further removed from the diction of the original; Hoveden omits it entirely.

800. The sentence "rex Karolus," etc., is taken, almost verbatim, from a Latin notice in the Laud manuscript of the Saxon Chronicle, a version which the compiler seems to have followed; it is amplified and clothed in very different language by Simeon; Hoveden omits it.

833. This year is omitted by Simeon; Florence has it, but in an abridged form; Hoveden nearly agrees with the Chron. Melr., but is less correct and close in translating from the Saxon.

851. The notice of the Danish invasion is probably a direct extract from the Saxon Chronicle, although Florence's narrative approaches nearly to the same source; Simeon and Hoveden give it differently.

866. The use of the word "degenerem," in our chronicle, is worthy of notice; Florence, and, from him, Simeon, here style Ella simply "tyrannum," but in the Saxon text he is described as "ungecyndne cyning," an epithet of which "degenerem" is a translation.

It would not be difficult to extend the number of instances equally conclusive.

² The copy of Simeon, which was used in the compilation of the present chronicle, seems to have contained the additions of John, prior of Hexham; compare the two authorities under the year 1131.

It would be easy to multiply instances, but they are too obvious to require notice.

antiqua chronica,"¹ "antiquum scriptum,"² or "vetusta chronica."³ Since, however, the earlier portion of our chronicle be but a compilation from other historians, it may be asked if Fordun did not derive these notices from the same common sources from which they were introduced into the chronicle of Melrose; but such was not the case, as will appear by a comparison of those passages which have undergone abridgement or alteration in being transcribed from the English original.⁴

§ 17. The chronicle of Lanercost contains many sentences transcribed from that of Melrose; and a comparison of the two leads to the conclusion that the copy was made by the English monks from the manuscript now preserved in the Cottonian Library.⁷

§ 18. The Chronicon Rythmicum, which has been entered into the chronicle of Melrose by a hand of the early part of the fourteenth century, must be considered an interpolation, and has been dealt with as such in the present edition.⁸ But the contents of fol. 53 of the manuscript, containing a few memoranda, have been inserted in their respective places in the text.

§ 19. When, or by what means, the manuscript now in the British Museum came into the hands of Sir Robert Cotton, cannot be ascertained. The editor is inclined to think, that by some accident it was carried off from Melrose at a period, if not anterior to, at least immediately after, the Reformation. Had it been preserved there when viscount Haddington had a grant of the Abbey-lands, it is probable that he would have preserved it along with the splendid collection of charters which came into his possession upon that occasion, or that some extracts from it would have been found in his "Collections of Charters, Evidents,

and Antiquities," now in the Advocates' Library.¹ The extracts in the Cottonian volume, Otho, D. iv., formerly belonging to lord Burleigh, are written in a hand considerably prior to the year 1600, and were made from the original manuscript now in the same noble library. A few excerpts, relative to Simon de Montfort, are amongst Stowe's Collections in the Harleian Library;² and from some memoranda kept by Sir Robert Cotton, it appears that in 1623 he lent the "manuscript chronicle of Melros" to Selden, who was the first to cite it in print.³ As already has been noticed, it was transcribed, under his directions, for the intended second volume of the English historians; and it is to be regretted that this work did not appear, for Selden and Twysden conducted their labours with more care than seems to have been bestowed by Fulman upon his edition.

§ 20. From what has been advanced, the editor believes that the following conclusions have been established:—

First, That the Cottonian manuscript, Faustina, B. ix., is the only ancient copy,⁴ and that all others are transcripts from this one original.

Second, That the first portion, namely, from the commencement to about the year 1140, is a compilation from existing histories, and, consequently, is to be used with caution.

Third, That the second portion, namely, from about the year 1140 to the termination of the volume, is possessed of the highest credibility, being the testimony of individuals⁵ who lived seldom later than half a century from the occurrence of the events which they record.

⁴ It is worthy of remark that the Cottonian Library possesses another manuscript which originated in the Scriptorium of Melrose. The volume marked Julius, B. xiii. contains, besides other matter, a short chronicle, extending from the birth of our Saviour to the year 249. The strongly marked character of the handwriting, exhibiting itself in the systematic adherence to peculiarities in the use and formation of certain letters and symbols, proves, beyond a doubt, that the scribe was the same as he who commenced the chronicle of Melrose. Had not that worthy monk prefaced his labours by an introduction showing the pre-determined and satisfactory principle which led him to commence his annals with the year 735, the perfect similarity between the two Cottonian manuscripts in the size of the vellum, the number of lines in each page, the arrangement of the text, and other coincidences, might almost lead to the belief that both these manuscripts were originally destined to form but one volume.

The following extracts are given as a specimen of the early chronology—frequently been made, as forming a part of the Collection of English Historians, usually known by the name of the editors, Gale and Fell, published at Oxford in 1684.¹ For all critical purposes that edition is, at the present time, valueless. A second edition was printed in 1835,² by the editor of the present Collection of Historians, for the use of the members of the Bannatyne club of Edinburgh; but as it was not published for sale, it is not easily procured. It is founded upon a careful collection of the Cottonian manuscript, and from this source the present translation has been made.

PREFACE TO JORDAN FANTOSME.

§ 1. A translation of the curious metrical "Chronicle of Jordan Fantosme" next claims the reader's notice. It gives a detailed account of the war carried on by William the Lion, king of Scotland, against Henry the second, king of England, which terminated in the capture of the former, near Alnwick, in Northumberland.

§ 2. The author, Jordan Fantosme,³ who frequently mentions himself in the course of his poem (see lines 521, 668, 674, 903, and 1152), was undoubtedly well acquainted with many of the circumstances which he has recorded. Thus (at lines 445—449) he states that he was an eye-witness of the atrocities perpetrated at Wark by the Scottish invaders.⁴ At line 1731, he speaks of his information "of his own knowledge." He was undoubtedly present at the capture of the Scottish king, for in his minute description of that event he takes care to say (line 1774): "I do not relate a fable, as one who has heard say, but as one who was there, and I myself saw it. And again we have his statement, "with my two eyes I saw it," (line 1810.) In contrast with this, he tells us that his account of the siege and capture of Norwich was not derived from personal observation (line 896); and, on another occasion, he thus addresses his readers (line 1910), "As far as I know, now hear the truth."

§ 3. In the midst, however, of this minute personal acquaintance with his subject, we are struck by observing that he commits the singular geographical blunder of supposing that the town of Berwick stands upon the river Tyne (lines 428, 1186), a mistake which would seem to imply that he was not a native of, and had not been long a resident in these districts.

§ 4. The external information which we possess respecting a Jordan Fantosme (doubtless the author of the present poem) helps us to a solution of a portion of this difficulty. We learn from some proceedings in a lawsuit, respecting lands in Hampshire, that in A. D. 1160, "magister Jordanus Fantasma" was in the service of Henry de Blois, bishop of Winchester, and brother of king Stephen; and it further appears, from a letter addressed to pope Adrian by John of Salisbury,¹ that he was engaged in a dispute with a clerk named John Joichel, who, without the permission of Fantasma, had opened a school at Winchester. Hence we can understand how a foreigner, probably a Norman by birth, and a resident of Winchester, should be at fault in his nomenclature of the localities of Northumberland.

§ 35. Two manuscripts of this poem are known to be extant, one in the library of the dean and chapter of Durham, the other in that of the dean and chapter of Lincoln. Both these copies are of the thirteenth century, and they agree very closely together, each scribe affording us the means of correcting the errors and supplying the omissions of the other. To the late Henry Petrie, Esq., is due the merit of having been the first to discover these copies; but the first (and only) edition of the text was given to the world through the instrumentality of the Surtees Society, by F. Michel.² This edition is accompanied by a translation, which, by the kind permission of the council of the Surtees Society, has been adopted as the basis of this edition. In several instances, however, the Editor has ventured to depart from the rendering of M. Michel. The text follows the Durham copy, but the variations of that of Lincoln have been noticed, whenever they affect the meaning of the author.

PREFACE TO SHORT CHRONICLES OF CANTERBURY AND WINCHESTER.

§ 1. Next follow several documents, which, from their nature, require no very minute description.

"The Catalogue of the Archbishops of Canterbury," from A. D. 598 to 1314, is transcribed from the MS. Register of Henry de Estrey, prior of Christ's Church, Canterbury,—who was elected A. D. 1285, and died A. D. 1328, (MS. Cott. Galba, E. iv. fol. 1, b.)—a volume of the fourteenth century. The translation is made from Wharton's text, (Anglia Sacra, i. 83,) and a few collations have been given from two other lists of a similar character, also quoted by Wharton, the Cottonian MSS., Julius, D. ii. fol. 1, of the thirteenth century, and Vitellius, E. xvii. fol. 225, which extends from A. D. 599 to 1294, and is of the fourteenth century.

² "Chronicle of the War between the English and the Scots, in 1173 and 1174. By Jordan Fantosme, Spiritual Chancellor of the Diocese of Winchester. Now first published, with a Translation, an Introduction, Notes, and an Appendix, by Francisque Michel." 8vo. Lond. 1840.

fol. 1, extending from the introduction of Christianity to the year 1160, shortly after which date this manuscript was written.

§ 3. "The Dates of the Decease of the Archbishops of Canterbury," from St. Augustine to Henry Deane (who died A. D. 1503), is derived from the same collection, (Anglia Sacra, i. 52,) where it is printed from a MS. in the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth, written shortly after the year 1517, and continued to 1538.

§ 4. "The History of the Archbishops of Canterbury, by Ralph de Diceto, from the first foundation of the see to A. D. 1200," but continued by another hand to A. D. 1240, is printed by Wharton, (Anglia Sacra, ii. 677,) from the Arundel MS. 220, a manuscript in the writing of the fourteenth century. The author was promoted to the deanery of London in the year 1181, and held the office in 1199;¹ but the exact date of his death is uncertain. Appended to this follows, "A notice by Ralph de Diceto of the succession of the archbishops of Canterbury, and of the popes from whom they received their palls," extending from St. Augustine to Hubert Walter, who filled the see from 1193 to 1205. Wharton prints this catalogue (Anglia Sacra, i. 87) from two manuscripts in Lambeth Library.

A similar list, to the time of Anselm, follows. It is translated from the Cottonian MS. Tiberius, A. vi., fol. 37, b, where it is written in a hand contemporary with its latest entry. The original Latin has not been printed.

§ 5. "A List of the Succession of the Archbishops of Canterbury, by a Canon of Lichfield," from St. Augustine to Simon Mepham, A. D. 1333, is printed by Wharton in the same collection (Anglia Sacra, i. 89), from a MS. then in his own possession.

§ 6. "The Annals of the Church of Winchester, from A. D. 633 to 1277," are derived from the Cottonian MS., Domit., A. xiii., and are here translated from two several editions, the former contained in the Monasticon Anglicanum of Dugdale and Dodsworth (i. 31), the other given by Wharton in the work to which reference has so frequently been made already (i. 288). Both these texts consist of selections from the Annals, of such portions only as appeared to their editors to contain the most important matter. The work frequently exhibits indications of being the remarks of a series of contemporary writers. The chronology is confused; the year sometimes being reckoned from the first of January, and sometimes from the twenty-fifth of March.

"The Names of the Bishops of Winchester" are transcribed from the Cottonian manuscript, Vesp., A. xvi., fol. 13, b, written about the beginning of the fourteenth century.

"The Succession of the Bishops of the Church of Winchester" is derived from two manuscripts, one in the Cottonian manuscript, Titus, C. xii. fol. 194, written in the sixteenth century, and the other in the Harleian collection, 1761, fol. 76, a manuscript of the fifteenth century. The additional matter supplied by the latter is appended in notes.

¹ Le Neve, ii. 307, 308. Bale and Pits state that he was alive in 1210.

A short "Chronicle of Winchester" concludes the volume. It extends from the introduction of Christianity into England to the year 1140, at which point the greater portion of it was written. It is here translated from the Cottonian manuscript, Nero, C. vii. fol. 218, b.

THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF HEXHAM, BY JOHN THE PRIOR.

THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF HEXHAM, BY JOHN THE PRIOR.

HERE BEGINS THE HISTORY OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS, BY JOHN,
THE PRIOR OF THE CHURCH OF HEXHAM.

A. D. 1130. ASCHETIL, the first prior of the church of Hexham, died on the fifteenth of the kalends of April [18th March]. By the courteous polish of his manners and by his probity, he had acquired the goodwill of both clergy and laity. Moreover he abundantly furnished that place, which by hostile ravages had been reduced to a desert, with costly buildings, his canons with needful supplies, and the convent with becoming appointments. In his place archbishop Turstin, in the same year, appointed as treasurer of the same place Robert Biseth, who was elected by the brethren; he was an educated man, and one who had been well trained.

A. D. 1131. King Henry nominated to the bishopric of Hereford Robert,¹ prior of Lantony. Pursuing the regular discipline in the canonical profession, he had already made that house a model to other establishments by the institutes of its rule. In his bishopric he also watched with the earnestness of a bishop's anxiety over episcopal affairs, and thus deservedly acquired in the kingdom a singular authority and respect of his sacred office.

A. D. 1132. Walter Espec,² a man great and powerful in the sight of the king and of the whole kingdom, received some monks of the Cistercian order, sent by Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, and placed them in the wilderness of Blackoumore, near the river Rye, from which their monastery is called Rievaulx.³ With them was sent William as their first abbot, a man of exalted virtue, and of memory illustrious with all posterity. Emulating their lofty purpose of an unwonted mode of life, Richard, prior of the convent of St. Mary at York, and the elders of the same place, (not without the factious opposition of their abbot Galfrid and the monastery,) set out on the sixth of the kalends of January [27th Dec.], in the same year, and founded the monastery of Fountains⁴ near Ripon; archbishop Turstin granting them a property. Over this presided, as first abbot, the aforesaid prior Richard, a man of much experience in ecclesiastical affairs.

A. D. 1133. In the month of August, before the Assumption of St. Mary, [15th Aug.,] there were consecrated at York, by archbishop Turstin, Geoffrey, king Henry's chancellor, to the bishopric of Durham; Aldulf, prior of Nostell, to the city of Carlisle, which king Henry had formed into an episcopal see, assigning to it the churches of Cumberland and Westmoreland, which adjoined the archdeaconry of York. Also king Henry, at the same time, gave the bishopric of Ely to Nigel, nephew of Roger, bishop of Salisbury. On the third of the nones of the same month of August [3d Aug.], an eclipse¹ of the sun took place for nearly the space of half-an-hour, on the twenty-seventh day of the moon, the fourth of the week [Wednesday], when king Henry was passing over to Normandy, where also he died.

¹ On² the eighth of the ides of October [8th Oct.], a comet was visible for about seven days. The greatest part of the city of London was destroyed by fire, on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week [17th May], in the thirty-third year of the reign of Henry king of the English [A. D. 1133]. On the very day of the anniversary of the death of this Henry's brother and predecessor William, named Rufus, and of Henry's accession to the throne, being the fourth of the nones of August [2d Aug.], there occurred a spectacle of this sort. When the aforesaid king Henry was staying on the coast, with the intention of crossing over, and the wind was frequently favourable for the passage; at length, about noon on the day aforesaid, the king had gone to the sea to cross, attended in royal manner by his escort of soldiers, there suddenly appeared in the air a cloud, which however was not seen to the same extent through all England; for in some places the day seemed rather dark, but in others the obscurity was such that under its cover men needed the light of a candle to transact business. The king, in consequence, and the royal company who were going about, and very many others, in astonishment raising their eyes to the sky, saw the sun shining like a new moon, which yet did not long remain in the same mood; for it sometimes seemed broader, sometimes thinner; at one time curved, at another straight; now steady as usual, now in motion, stirring and liquid like quicksilver. Some assert that an eclipse of the sun took place; if this be true, the sun was then in the head of the dragon and the moon in the tail; or the sun in the tail and the moon in the head, in the fifth sign—that is, Leo—in the seventeenth degree of that sign. The moon was then twenty-seven days old. Likewise, on the same day, when the ships ready for the passage of the said king were firmly at anchor at the shore, the sea being very calm, and the wind continuing moderate, the great anchors of one ship were torn from their moorings as by some sudden violence, and the ship, to the astonishment of many who strove, but were not able, to hold it, being put in motion, moved also the vessel next it, and so the eight vessels were stirred by an unknown power, and none of them remained uninjured. Many also said, that on the same day and about the same hour, they saw many churches in the province of York bedewed as it were with a great sweat. All these things took place, as has been said, on Wednesday, the fourth of the nones of August [2d Aug.]. On the sixth day of the same week, namely, the first of the nones [4th Aug.] of the same month, early in the morning, there was a great earthquake in many parts of England. There were also some who said, that on the Monday of the following week, namely, the sixth¹ of the ides of the same month, when the moon was three days old, they saw her at first, as is usual, at that age; but in a short period in the evening of the same day they saw her large, in the shape of a round and very glittering shield. Many also said, that on that night they saw two moons, the one distant about a spear's length from the other. King Henry crossed the sea from England into Normandy, from which he did not return home alive.

A. D. 1134. Robert duke of Normandy died, whom king Henry, his brother, had kept in custody to the day of his death.

A. D. 1135. In the sixty-ninth year after the coming of the Normans to England, king Henry, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, after eating some lampreys, sickened and died at St. Denis, in a certain forest of Normandy called Leuns, on Monday, being the fourth of the nones of December [2d Dec.]. He reigned gloriously for thirty-five years and four months. His body (as he had directed) was brought to England and buried at Reading; which monastery he had himself founded, and furnished it with a convent of monks, endowed with a royal munificence of revenues. He founded, also, another monastery—namely, Cirencester—four years before his death, and provided the regular canons, whom he there established, with abundance of all things requisite. Since him has arisen another prince, who prohibited unjust taxations of the kingdom, ruled his subjects in peace and moderation of wisdom, reverently esteemed ecclesiastical persons, and maintained the poor and religious with sumptuous alms. At his death forthwith arose wicked men and sinners, who cast aside all the rules of justice and peace, and violently committed plunderings and slaughters, burnings and other enormities.

A. D. 1136. Stephen, earl of Bologne, king Henry's sister's son, brother of Theobald earl of Blois, and of Henry bishop of Winchester, assumed the diadem of the kingdom on the kalends² of January [1st Jan.], William, archbishop of Canterbury, and the whole of the clergy and laity of London, consenting to his promotion. In the ceremony of his consecration, the giving of the kiss of peace was omitted. Spurning his authority, Geoffrey, earl of Anjou (who had married Henry's daughter, and by her had an heir named Henry), began to create much disturbance in Normandy. David also, king of Scotland, the uncle of the same empress, not unmindful of the oath which he and the whole of the kingdom had sworn to king Henry with regard to his succession, immediately invaded the kingdom of England, and very soon gained the fortresses of Cumberland and Northumberland, and overran the adjacent districts as far as Durham, with the exception of Bamborough. He received also allegiance and security from the more noble, to the effect that they would preserve fealty to his niece. King Stephen met him at the beginning of Lent,¹ on the nones of February [5th Feb.], at Durham, where he resided for fifteen days. King David also betook himself to Newcastle; and a conference being held between them respecting an arrangement, Henry son of the king of Scotland did homage to king Stephen at York. Whereupon Doncaster and Carlisle were given him as an addition to the honour of Huntingdon.² King David restored the other fortresses and lands which he held. At the feast of Easter [22d March], king Stephen, in proof of the regard which he felt for the same Henry, made him sit at his right hand; wherefore William, archbishop of Canterbury, and some nobles, together with Ralph, earl of Chester, spoke disrespectfully of the young man, and withdrew themselves from the king's court. King David, when his son returned, would not send him back to king Stephen. Moreover the Welsh, ravaging the frontiers of England, killed two barons, Richard Fitz-Roger and Pain Fitz-John; nevertheless, they very soon made peace with king Stephen. Also Ralph, earl of Chester, making an incursion into the territories of the Welsh, being surprised by them with five soldiers, barely escaped with life, all the others being put to the sword. King Stephen also besieged the rebel Baldwin de Redvers in his town of Exeter, compelled him to a surrender, and banished him from the kingdom. In the same year, pope Innocent, by letters sent from the apostolic see, confirmed the same king Stephen in the occupation of the kingdom. The king, as directed by the purport of these letters, having convoked a general council, ordered good and ancient laws and right customs to be observed, and injustices to be abolished. There were present at this council, William, archbishop of Canterbury; Hugh, archbishop of Rouen; Henry, bishop of Winchester; Roger, bishop of Salisbury; Alexander, bishop of Lincoln; Nigel, bishop of Ely; Everard, bishop of Norwich; Simon, bishop of Worcester; Bernard, bishop of St. David's; Audoen, bishop of Evreux; Richard, bishop of Avranches; Robert, bishop of Hereford; John, bishop of Rochester; and Aldulf, bishop of Carlisle. In the month of August king Stephen crossed the sea, taking alarm at the hostilities of Geoffrey, earl of Anjou. In the month of November³ of the same year, William, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was buried in his city.

A. D. 1137. David, king of Scotland, threatened to devastate Northumberland. A multitude of the earls and nobles of England speedily assembled at Newcastle to oppose his designs. Also Turstin, archbishop of York, although greatly debilitated by old age, conferred with the king of Scotland and his son at Roxburgh, and obtained a truce until the return of king Stephen from Normandy. Hereupon king Stephen, having made an agreement for two years with Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, returned to England at the Advent of our Lord [28th Nov.]. The ambassadors of the king of Scotland came, demanding that Northumberland should be given to his son Henry, which king Stephen refusing, the truce was broken off.

A. D. 1138. That renowned abbey of St. Mary at Bechland¹ was founded and built before the Nativity of our Lord, by the nobleman Roger de Mowbray, who endowed it with farms, and estates, and great pastures and woods. On the fourth of the ides of January [10th Jan.], William, son of Duncan, nephew of king David, making an inroad before dawn, boldly poured the part of the army which he commanded around the town of Wark, and attempted to storm and carry it. King David coming with a larger train with catapults and many engines of war, besieged the town in great force for three weeks; but Jordan de Bussey,² the nephew of Walter Espec, the commander of the garrison, by the unyielding courage of the minds of his men, set at nought and rendered useless all the king's endeavours; for they slew the king's standard-bearer, and every day many others. King David, therefore, appointing some to press the siege, sent on William, the son of Duncan, with the Scots into Northumberland; who, coming on the day of the Conversion of St. Paul [25th Jan.] to the village of Warden, which is in the neighbourhood of Hexham, they encamped there with his forces. A certain Scot, a powerful and wealthy man in his native land, having advanced from the troops with his own men, apparently with the intention of marching along the river Tyne to the church of Hexham, in the expectation of plunder, the young men of Hexham sallied out upon them; and having put his companions to flight, after a fierce resistance, bore him down and pierced him through the body. Fierce anger was stirred up, in consequence, throughout the whole army of the Scots; who, on account of his slaughter, were hastening to rush upon the church of Hexham, and utterly destroy it, with its inhabitants. But William, the son of Duncan, anxious for the preservation of the place, recalled them. King David followed with his son and his troops, and stopping at Corbridge until after the Purification of St. Mary [2d Feb.], did not fail to throw the affairs of the province into confusion. Out of respect, however, to the dignity and antiquity of the church of Hexham, he kept peace with it and all who had taken refuge at it; sending thither five Scots, lest any one should venture to invade it with a hostile intention. It would be incredible were we to narrate the wicked, infamous, and blasphemous doings of that army of Scots against God, and their abuses of humanity itself; slaughters, plunders, and conflagrations everywhere prevailed. These barbarians had no mercy on the infant or the orphan, the aged or the poor; they spared neither sex, age, or rank, nor any degree or profession; they cut to pieces women with child; and, having slain all the males, they next drove off in gangs to Scotland, under the yoke of slavery, the virgins and widows, naked and bound with cords. Nevertheless, the king, as often as they fell to him as a share of the spoil, restored them to Robert, prior of Hexham, in token of their freedom. The Scots also broke into the sanctuaries of the Lord, and profanely perpetrated violence, obscenity, and abominations in the consecrated places. Two of them having broken open the door of the oratory of St. Michael, on the north side of the Tyne, carried off what they found. This church adjoins the church of Hexham. These men, continually possessed by fiends, when they were rambling before the army through inaccessible places, both perished miserably; the one breaking his bones among the rocks, the other being drowned in the fords of the river Tyne. They afterwards pursued across the Tyne the inhabitants of the district, who had fled into the desert places; and rushing upon a multitude of the whole province, who were in quiet and security at the place called Tanfield, they butchered them all, and carried away abundant spoil. The king, at length, returned with his men to his own country; and king Stephen coming in Lent¹ with a force of military to Wark, ordered his men to slaughter and make havoc on the land of the king of Scotland. But king David, having placed himself and his men at no great distance within a marsh (which was of very limited extent, and wholly inaccessible all around except by an intricate path), ordered the citizens of Roxburgh boldly to admit the king of England within the city if he should approach; for he watched for the opportunity of assailing him by night, being confident that he would have as allies in this preconcerted plot many of the nobles of the English army, who had clandestinely stirred him up to the contest. But notice of the snare was given to king Stephen, who, preparing to return in displeasure, compelled Eustace² to resign into his hand the fortress of Bamborough, and hastily marched back into England.

After the celebration of Easter week,³ king David of Scotland again conducted an expedition into Northumberland, and destroyed all the places about the coast which had escaped the former inroad. He advanced even as far as Newcastle, and sent forward his troops to commit cruelties and hostilities about Durham, and as far as the Tees. Thence making a diversion to the bishop of Durham's castle at Norham, he caused it to be besieged, and soon compelled the townsmen to surrender it, and ordered the town itself to be destroyed. Meanwhile, William, son of Duncan, as he was slaying and ravaging about Clitheroe, encountered an array of English soldiery, which met him in four bands. Putting them to flight by the energy of his first attack, he put them to the sword, and bore off much booty and a number of prisoners. This fight between the English, the Picts, and the Scots, took place at Clitheroe, on Friday, the fifteenth day before the Nativity of St. John the Baptist [10th June], in the aforesaid year, namely, eleven hundred and thirty-eight.

After these incidents, the soldiers made a sally from Wark, and seized the king's servants and carriages with provisions, driving them into the town. But also making an attack upon the king's son Henry, and his escort, they killed some, and some they wounded or carried off for ransom. The king, annoyed at this, punished them by a renewal of the siege, destroying their crops in the fields, and cutting off all relief. He was able wholly to reduce them only by want of provisions; for, compelled by this need, at the command of their lord, Walter Espec, about the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.], they surrendered the town, through the agency of the lord William, the first abbot of Reivaux; there was found in it nothing left to eat, except one live horse and another in salt. The king bestowed on them twenty-four horses, and dismissed them in freedom with their arms; but the town he utterly destroyed.

In the same year, and at the same period, namely, in autumn, king David, having united his forces, directed his march into Yorkshire; having in the meanwhile sent two of his barons, with a number of men, to besiege Wark. Eustace Fitz-John, from whom king Stephen had taken Bamborough, joined him with his troop of soldiers, as an ally. This man had in Northumberland a very strong castle at Alnwick, and another in Yorkshire, namely, Malton. They marched, therefore, by Bamborough; and the young men of this place, rashly presuming on the strength of the wall which they had built before the castle, annoyed with taunts the Scots as they passed by. The Scots, provoked in temper, forthwith set themselves to the destruction of the wall, and, speedily breaking in, killed all on whom they laid hands.

At that time, archbishop Turstin, of sacred memory, presided over the church of York—a man of unyielding firmness of mind, in prosperity or adversity, advanced in years and feeble in body, so that he had to be carried on a litter wherever the pressure of affairs demanded. He called out the nobles of Yorkshire, and, by the watchfulness of his pastoral care, he stirred them up to a steady resistance. There came also Bernard de Baliol, a man well skilled in military tactics, bringing with him soldiers sent by king Stephen to this undertaking. Gathering, therefore, great courage from their joint deliberation, they mutually bound themselves by oaths to firmness and assurance. Having, therefore, sought the favour of God by a three days' fast and by alms, and being strengthened by the archbishop's absolution and blessing, all, animated by one purpose of mind, advanced to the town of Thirsk. Thence Robert de Bruce and Bernard de Baliol went to the king of Scotland, on the Tees, promising his son Henry the earldom of Northumberland, and exhorting him to cease from this invasion. The king refused to acquiesce. Robert, therefore, absolved himself from the homage which he had done him for the barony which he held of him in Galloway, and Bernard from the fealty which he had formerly promised; and so they returned to their comrades. They all, marching to Northallerton, erected in a certain plain belonging to the franchise of St. Cuthbert, the standard—that is, a ship's mast—hanging over them the banner of St. Peter and St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon; and they placed over them the Body of the Lord, to be their standard-bearer and the leader of their battle. Archbishop Turstin then sent with them Ralph Novellus, his suffragan bishop,¹ and other men qualified to receive their confession, and to build them up by means of satisfaction in the hope of a future life. The archbishop himself, prudently withdrawn by the chiefs from this march to battle, was with his clergy instant in prayers and supplications, in much affliction and sorrow of heart, until it was told him how great a deliverance God vouchsafed to his people. So, then, on the octave of the assumption of St. Mary, being Monday, the eleventh of the kalends of September [22d Aug.], the whole army assembled round the standard, the horses having been sent to a distance, lest any one should conceive the thought of flight, all with one impulse determining to die or conquer for their country. These were the chiefs who were most eminent in rank and dignity:—William de Albemarle, earl Walter de Gant, Robert de Bruce, Roger de Mowbray, Walter Espec, William de Percy, Bernard de Baliol, Richard de Courcy, William Fossard, Robert de Stuthaville, Ilbert de Lacy. This man, and his father Robert de Lacy, had been banished by king Henry from the kingdom of England. After the king's death, a certain soldier of that barony, named Pain, slew William Transversus, who by the king's gift had obtained possession of the barony of Pontefract,² and this Ilbert took possession of the barony by right of inheritance. There were present also with their troops, William Peverel, from the county of Nottingham; and Robert de Ferrers, from Derbyshire; and Geoffrey Halsalin.

The king of Scotland now advanced with his troops in battle array, the Scots being disposed in the first line; they, to a man, demanding for themselves this position, for the honour of their country. Naked, and almost unarmed, these men advanced against battalions clad in mail, and thereby rendered invulnerable. Around the king were placed men who had attained the order of knighthood, girt with their weapons of war. The king believed that his bond required him to conquer or die, out of regard to the oath which he had sworn to the heirs of king Henry, and the whole of England with him. The Scots and the Picts with difficulty resisted from the first hour of the commencement of the conflict to the third; for they found themselves pierced and destroyed by arrows, overwhelmed, and overthrown. They all stole away from the field, casting away their baggage; and, in scorn of this affair, that place was called Bagmoor. Soon the firmness of the rest of the army was shaken and weakened. The chiefs, therefore, induced the king to call in the horses, and march off with his ranks unbroken, lest he, too, should perish with his men. The army of York did not pursue the fugitives, but each man hastened to return to his own place. Very many of the Scots, straggling in ignorance of the locality, were put to death wherever they were found. Moreover, the very ranks of the Scots and Picts, when they encountered each other in their retreat, striving in useless enmity, destroyed themselves. The king, therefore, having regained his kingdom, fined the Scots and Picts, whom he summoned to his presence, in a large sum of money, and received hostages and oaths from them, that in every conflict and danger they would faithfully stand by him and for him. The king of England also, elated with these triumphs of his, made William de Albemarle earl in Yorkshire, and Robert de Ferrers earl in Derbyshire.

In the same¹ year died Peter Leo,² who having been by his own procuring invested by certain persons in the city as pope, out of hostility to pope Innocent, was for eight years an incubus on the Roman Church. Innocent truly held rank by free authority over the city, as he had formerly done over the circuit of the church's monarchy. He also, by a general decree, deposed all the partakers in the schism of Peter Leo from all ecclesiastical order and rank, and forbad, under anathema, that any one in future should, by similar presumption, usurp the apostolic see. By the same pope there was sent as legate to England and Scotland, Albericus, bishop of Ostia, by birth a Gaul, by profession a monk of Clugny, and who had in that convent been appointed over all the monks in the office of sub-prior, to administer the observances of their rule; a man endowed with surpassing virtue and abundance of learning. Coming to England, he took as assistants in his duty, Robert, bishop of Hereford, and Richard, the first abbot of Fountains. And in his route to the king of Scotland he was reverently received by the brethren of the church of Hexham, and with him bishop Aldulf. Three days before he arrived at that place, Eadgar, son of earl Cospatric, with a band of followers, had sallied from the camp of the king of Scotland, seizing plunder from a certain village of the territory of Hexham. They had also attacked a certain village belonging to the brethren of Hexham; and having killed three of their men and seized the spoil of that village, they dishonoured the prior of Hexham, who chanced to be there that night, by insults and mockery. The legate, with a mind fully sympathising on account of this wrong, remonstrated with the king at Carlisle, and prevailed on the royal conscience to make amends for this violence. Then for three days, with the bishops and nobles of the kingdom of Scotland, who by the king's order had met him there, he corrected what needed correction, and decreed what ought to be decreed. He obtained for bishop Aldulf a friendly reception into the favour of the same king, and to his see of Carlisle. He recalled by apostolic authority John, bishop of Glasgow, who, laying aside his episcopal office, had given himself up to the monkish profession at Tiron.¹ He made also the Scots and Picts yield to him in this matter, that after the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.] they should bring back all their prisoners to Carlisle and give them their freedom, and that none of them should again dare to violate churches, or commit slaughter on the female sex, on boys, or old men. Throwing himself at the feet of this king, he forced him to cease from hostility till the feast of St. Martin. Having disposed of these matters, he returned on the feast of St. Michael [29th Sept.] to the church of Hexham, and then he set out for the south of England. The whole of Northumberland indeed was uncultivated and reduced to a desert, for as many as survived had either sought asylum in the monasteries or were lurking in the wilds; the stronger ones had shut themselves up within the towns. Therefore, by authority of the apostolic order, on the feast of St. Nicholas [6th Dec.], the bishops, abbots, and nobles of the kingdom met the same legate, Alberic, at London,² in Westminster, in the ninth year of the pontificate of pope Innocent, and the third of the reign of king Stephen; the church of Canterbury was vacant, and the lord Turstin, archbishop of York, being enfeebled, sent his dean William in his stead. The legate, prohibiting what should be prohibited, and enacting what the nature of the requirements of the church demanded to be enacted, summoned them to appear at Rome, before the lord pope, at mid-Lent. Having deposed also the abbot of Croyland, he consecrated as abbots, Godfrey, prior of St. Albans, in his place, and Adam elect to Battle, near Hastings. The matter of the election to the church of Canterbury was also agitated, the elect of which church, namely, Theobald, abbot of Bec, he consecrated archbishop over that see about the Epiphany of our Lord [6th Jan.]. He also besought, with much entreaty, the king of England, respecting the renewal of a peace with the king of Scotland. Matilda, queen of the English, lent her aid to his wishes by her private entreaties, being by no means indifferent to the preservation of peace between her husband and the king of Scotland, her uncle; for king David had two sisters, Mary and Matilda: the latter married king Henry; Mary, the earl of Bologne had taken in marriage, and of her begat this Matilda, his heiress. But king Stephen took her for his wife with the earldom of Bologne; he had of her sons Eustace and William, who by an early death deceased without children.

In the same year a certain nobleman³ in Northumberland received on his property, at the castle called Morpeth, on the nones of January [5th Jan.], eight monks of Fountains, who built the monastery called Newminster: for whom, on the feast of Epiphany in this year, Geoffrey, bishop of Durham, consecrated as abbot the holy man Robert. Them the aforesaid man, namely, Ralph de Merley, gladly favoured.

A. D. 1139. The aforesaid legate, Alberic, returned after the octave of the Epiphany [13th Jan.], accompanied on his journey to Rome by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury (who went for the pall), the bishop of Rochester, Simon of Worcester, Roger of Coventry, and Robert of Exeter. The king held the other bishop excused from this journey, on account of the disturbances which were arising everywhere throughout the kingdom. At the instance of the queen of the English, a truce was agreed upon between the two kings; Henry, son of the king of Scotland, receiving at Durham the earldom of Northumberland. This agreement was confirmed by the queen and Henry, son of the king of Scotland, on the fifth of the ides of April [9th April], before the earls and barons of England, hostages being given by the Scots in token of their fidelity. Earl Henry went with the queen to the king at Nottingham; and as he attended him during the summer, he made munificent presents. He also took to wife Ada, sister of William earl of Warren, and Walaran earl of Mellent, and Robert earl of Leicester; and by her he had these sons, Malcolm, William, and David. Archbishop Theobald, having returned with his suffragans from the sovereign pope, Henry, bishop of Winchester, was appointed legate of the apostolic see. There died at Rome a man of approved virtue, Richard, first abbot of Fountains, whom archbishop Turstin had sent as his legate to the pope. Also Audoenus,¹ bishop of Evreux, brother of the same archbishop Turstin, died and was buried at Merton, having taken the habit of the canons. Walter of Gant, and Robert de Ferrers, also died. It happened the same year that Roger, bishop of Salisbury, Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, and Nigel, bishop of Ely, nephews of the same Roger, met at the king's court; and a tumult having arisen, the servants of the bishop, among the rest of the mob, cut down a certain nephew of Alan, earl of Richmond, who afterwards died. In consequence of this, the same earl laid an accusation before the king against the bishops, that the disturbance was raised by their faction in a plot against the king's safety. Bishop Nigel speedily escaped from the court by a clandestine flight to his fortresses; and the king felt all the more excited to revenge himself upon bishops Roger and Alexander, whom he compelled (by totally depriving them of food) to surrender their castles, with the abundant treasures which they laid up in them. But, besides this, he irreverently committed other unworthy deeds against them, contrary to the dignity of the episcopal rank. And it came to pass at that time, that the laity rose to great disobedience and insolence towards the holy church and ecclesiastical persons; whereupon the legate Henry assembled at Winchester archbishop Theobald and the bishops of England, along with such others as were earnest about the Christian faith, about the month of September, and decreed enactments extremely necessary and very useful in all ages. For by these, even to the present day, ecclesiastical severity is effectually brought to bear upon those persons who either wickedly employ their hands in injuring the clergy, or plunder the property of the church, whether they lie under excommunication or die in it, since, by the promulgation of these decrees, the insolence of the multitude and the presumption of the rebellious spirit were taught to submit and respect the sanctuary of the Lord.

The same year died Roger, bishop of Salisbury, whose son, the king's chancellor, the king, out of enmity to the father, had banished from the kingdom. Thus at last the glory of former circumstances was brought low in him at whose will, in the days of king Henry, all the business of the kingdom had been conducted; for, being second only to the king, he was exalted above all the judges and princes in the kingdom. Joselin, archdeacon of Winchester, succeeded him in the see of Salisbury. And it came to pass, that the empress Alice, daughter of king Henry, and wife of Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, having landed in England, king Stephen speedily besieged her in a certain castle, and compelled her to surrender; but, out of an indiscreet simplicity of mind, he allowed her to go free to Bristol: her brother, earl Robert, took up her cause, and the soldiers who were in the fortresses—namely, Gloucester, and Milo, in Hereford, and Brien Fitz-Count, in Wallingford, with the neighbouring population—favoured her undertaking. By her means arose a great disturbance in England, and the stability of king Stephen's reign was shaken.

A. D. 1140. Archbishop Turstin of blessed memory, worn out with old age, and broken down with long labours, felt that the dissolution of his body was at hand. For having been appointed to the government of the church of York in the year one thousand one hundred and fourteen, on the Assumption of St. Mary [15th Aug.], he had boldly fought the good fight for it, had perseveringly kept the faith, had victoriously finished his course; since he was harassed by the king with no slight hostilities on account of his refusal to make the profession to the prelates of Canterbury, choosing rather to renounce his election than to impair the ancient liberty of his church.¹ Departing from the king's presence, he acquired among foreign nations a large body of friends, namely, nobles and women of rank, who dutifully aided him in his sojourn abroad. Amongst and before whom, bound to him by a greater devotion of mind, was Adela, countess of Chartres, the sister of king Henry, and mother of king Stephen and earl Theobald.

A. D. 1141.² Pope Calixtus held a council at Rheims, on the thirteenth of the kalends of November [19th Oct.]. The Lord was with the aforesaid Turstin, whence also he evaded all the endeavours which his enemies made against him, by obtaining a sounder sentence; since the pope, at the intercession of the cardinals, confirmed him in his archbishopric by a solemn consecration, and by giving him a free pall; he also entirely disregarded the opposition of the king, and all the outcry of the people of Canterbury. Having also given him privileges to the extent of his wishes, he forbade, in future, the archbishop of Canterbury to demand, or the archbishop of York to make, the profession.

² The biographical notice of archbishop Thurstan is here continued under the year 1141; the Council of Rheims was held A. D. 1119. See Labb. Concil. x. 862, and Simeon ad an.

In the year one thousand one hundred and twenty-one, the sovereign pope's epistle was sent to the king, and to Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, that no one should celebrate the service of the divine ministry in the churches of Canterbury and York, or in the parishes adjoining them (except baptism of infants and the shriving of the dying), unless within one month after the receipt of this epistle Turstin should be received into the see of York, without the exaction of the profession. He was in consequence very soon recalled to England by the king, and solemnly enthroned in his church. When he was admitted, to mark the contempt in which he held his rank, he laid aside nothing of the discipline of a holy life and a fixed resolution of mind; for in food and clothing, and the other monastic usages, he in all respects exhibited moderation in his episcopal dignity. In distributing alms and benevolence to the poor in the days of his ministry, rarely was there found one like him. He was also frequent in prayers, and had from God the grace of tears in the celebration of masses. This man wore a shirt of hair-cloth, and amid frequent confessions did not spare himself from corporal castigation. His daily anxiety was the care of souls; he preferred disciplined and learned men to ecclesiastical offices; he placed the disposal of the affairs of the church in their hands; by his pastoral zeal he cut off the allurements of the wicked; he was cheerful in hospitality, placable with uprightness towards the submissive, severe without inhumanity towards the rebellious. Two years before his election, he endowed the church of Hexham, which was founded on the principles of the regular order, with lands, possessions, and great offerings, advancing it to a good position in the divine service. He also watched over the monks of the monastery of Fountains, of which he was the founder, with similar munificent care. In the church of York, and other churches, there are held in great reverence, in memory of him, the treasured offerings, precious and numerous, which he with a bountiful hand bestowed upon them. He so ordered his men and his house in quiet peace and abundance of necessaries,—so preserved the liberties, dignities, and privileges of churches and ecclesiastical persons, and carried them on to daily religious improvement,—that one would certainly say that the divine wisdom co-operated with him. Few are there in these days who with such regard cherish religious persons, promote them to benefices, constantly supply necessitous places with sumptuous alms. Feeling, then, that the vigour of life was growing weak in him, he wisely set his house in order, paying his servants' wages, restoring what had been taken away, and taking thought with skilful management about each separate matter. Having assembled in his chapel the priests of the church of York, and solemnly made confession before them, he stretched himself naked on the ground before the altar of St. Andrew, and received from them the discipline of corporal chastisement, with tears flowing from a contrite heart; and, mindful of the vow which, as a young man, he had made at Clugny, he went to the monks of the Clugniac order at Pontefract, the elders of the church of York and many of the laity accompanying him; and on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul [25th Jan.], he solemnly received the habit and benediction of a monk; and during the remaining days of his life, he was intent on the salvation of his soul. In the year, then, of our Lord's incarnation one thousand one hundred and forty, (being the seventy-fifth from the coming of the Normans to England, the fifth of the reign of Stephen, the twenty-fifth year and sixth month of his archiepiscopate,) on Thursday, the eighth of the ides of February [6th Feb.], surrounded by the principal persons of the church of York and other religious men, as the hour of his summons drew near, he himself celebrated nine vigils for the departed, and himself read the lesson, gave the verse of the response, "Dies illa, dies irae," laying a mournful and significant emphasis on each word, and at the end of lauds, the monks being all assembled at prayer, he yielded up his spirit. He was buried with becoming honour, before the high altar, in the church of St. John the Evangelist. Some days after this he appeared, duly arrayed in his pontifical robes, to one of his archdeacons, Geoffrey Turcople,¹ a man of well-known attainments in scholastic learning, as he was reposing in slumber; and on his asking, "Is there not hope of my salvation, my father?" he answered him in these words:

"Life in the flesh was death; but being freed
From fleshly trammels, blest I live indeed."

Many years afterwards, the monks wishing to make some repairs near the place of his interment, the stone placed over it was removed, when no appearance of corruption was found either in his corpse or his vestments. After his death, forthwith sprang up the insolence and roving licence of unrestrained disputes, shameless contempt of the clergy, irreverence of the laity towards ecclesiastical laws and persons; the solidity of the kingdom was destroyed, because each man's will was his law.

In the same year, earl Henry² went with his wife to the king of England. Ralph, earl of Chester, rose in hostility against him, on account of Carlisle and Cumberland, which he claimed as his own by right of inheritance, and he endeavoured with an armed force to entrap him on his return. But the king, instigated by the queen's entreaties, restored him to his father and his country, having secured him from the threatened danger; and this hostility was transferred to plots against the king's safety: for earl Ralph seized all the fortifications of Lincoln. Earl Alan,³ in a stealthy night-attack, scaling the wall, stormed with his men the fortress of Galcluit,⁴ and seized that castle, with its abundant treasure, having driven out William de Albany,⁵ with his men. The same Alan, earl of Richmond, fortified a camp at Houghton,¹ in the land of the bishop of Durham; and his hand was raised against Ripon, and the men of that place. For he and other powerful men carried off whatever necessaries archbishop Turstin had kept stored in barns and other places for his successor, according as each man bordered on the archiepiscopal lands.

A. D. 1142. After the death of archbishop Turstin, the clergy of York were for a whole year, according to the impulse of their heart, driven about in various and unsettled opinions about making an election. At the persuasion of the legate, Henry of Winchester they had chosen king Stephen's nephew, Henry de Coilli;² but as he presided over the abbey of Caen, the sovereign pontiff would not appoint him to the archbishopric, unless he would resign the former dignity. Again proceeding to an election in the month of January, most of them agreed on the person of William,³ the treasurer. William,⁴ earl of York, was present, being anxious for his promotion. And at the same hour there appeared above them in the air a large sign of the cross extended over the length and breadth of the church of St. Peter. Opposed to this election was master Walter, archdeacon of London, with his brother archdeacons; the same earl waylaid him, as he was on his way to the king, and shut him up in his castle of Biham; and so the bishop elect, having been brought to Lincoln, the king gladly received him, and confirmed him in the lands and possessions of York.

In this same month of January, Ralph, earl of Chester, having formed a conspiracy with his companions at Lincoln, obstinately determined on harassing the king's kingdom. (An earthquake had been thrice heard in the same city after Christmas-day.) This conspiracy very speedily became known to king Stephen, who appeared quickly and unexpectedly, and laid siege to the earl. The earl sallied by night from the fortress in which he was blockaded, and went to Robert, earl of Gloucester, whose daughter he had married, and him also he drew over to his own side, as well as the family of the empress and the Welsh. The nobles urged the king to levy an army, declaring that they had assembled, unarmed, to confer with the king, and not to engage in battle. The king was scornful, exclaiming, that those cowardly boys would never attempt any such thing against him; for he was cajoled by the speciousness of the young earls, who in speech favoured the king, but by counsel and aid supported the forces of his adversaries.

On the Purification of St. Mary [2d Feb.], there came up in strong force Robert, earl of Gloucester, Ralph, earl of Chester, and his brother William de Romar; Robert was the leader and conductor of the battle. The king also led out his allies to the combat. Before the commencement of the fight, Alan, earl of Richmond, abandoned the king and the battle; William,⁵ earl of York, placed the king in peril by deserting from the field. The enemy, deriving encouragement from this, slaughtered those who stood firm; Bernard de Baliol, Roger de Mowbray, Richard de Courcy, William Fossart, William Peverel, William Clerfeith, and many others, were taken prisoners. Many being slain, all were at length overthrown, as also Waleran, earl of Mellent. The king stood in the fight like a lion, the bravest of the brave, fearing the attack of no one. He cut down all who encountered him, until his sword was shattered in his hand; but a certain citizen of Lincoln supplied him with a Danish axe. It is not easy to tell with what a spirit of bravery he pressed on the enemy. He at length perceived that almost all his comrades being scattered, he would be left alone, yet no one ventured to lay hands on him to take him. Earl Ralph, who was desirous of making an attack on him, he struck on the head with his axe, and, bringing him on his knees to the ground, taught him to be more careful for the future. At his own suggestion, earl Robert, his kinsman, the son of king Henry, was called, to whom the king himself consented to make surrender of his person. He was then brought to Bristol, and placed in confinement. William de Clerfeith cleverly escaping from the hands of earl Ralph, betook himself to his castle of Tickhill, and by constant alarms harassed that earl and his company. After this the same earl compelled Gilbert de Gant, a youth who was taken prisoner with the king, to marry his niece. Earl Ralph seized Alan, earl of Richmond, when summoned to a conference with him, and compelled him by great distress of famine to surrender to him the castle of Galdiut¹ and the treasure stored in it, and inflicted upon him other injuries. The empress Adela deprived William Peverel of the castle of Nottingham, and placed in it as warden William Paine, with his troops. Other men of eminence, who were taken with the king, she released, an agreement for their ransom having been made. The greatest portion of the kingdom submitted to her, the legate Henry and archbishop Theobald acknowledging the government of the said empress; as did also the cities of London and Winchester.

The see of London becoming vacant, Robert de Sigillo, who had been king Henry's chancellor, then a monk of Reading, a good man, was called to the administration of that see, which was to its advantage.

After Easter died Geoffrey,² bishop of Durham. His relatives concealing this event, had him disembowelled, and sprinkled and steeped in salt, and so they kept him unburied until (acting upon the authority of David, king of Scotland) they admitted within the fortress of Durham William Cumin, chancellor of the said king. For the said William had been a clerk and pupil of this bishop Geoffrey, in the court of king Henry.

King David, seeing that many things concurred to the advancement of the empress, his niece, after our Lord's ascension [28th May], proceeded to join her in the south of England. Coming to Durham, he was admitted into the town, where he ordered that everything should be reserved for the decision of the empress, and in the meanwhile that William Cumin should undertake the charge of affairs. The king then came to his niece, and got most of the nobles to agree with him, that she should be elevated to the rule of the whole kingdom. But she, far from following the king's counsel, elated by woman's levity, assumed a majestic haughtiness of demeanour, and so she provoked the nobles by arrogant denunciations; she also declared that she would deal severely with king Stephen. On this account the legate Henry, bishop of Winchester, king Stephen's brother, deserted from her, and very many were excited to enmity against her. Also the citizens of London drove her from the city, and very great disturbance arose in the kingdom, from dissensions between those who held for the empress and those who abjured her. William de Ypres, a Fleming, governed the household of king Stephen, and Pharamus,¹ a nephew of queen Matilda, who also was a native of Boulogne. The queen made supplication to all, importuned all with prayers, promises, and fair words for the deliverance of her husband. And God resisted the proud, and gave grace to the humble. For the empress having collected her forces, went up with the king of Scotland and earl Robert to Winchester, she having heard that her soldiers who were besieged in the royal fortress, had been vanquished by the troops of the legate who were within its walls. The queen, advancing with her forces, laid siege to them. And in this adventure she obtained the aid of the legate Henry, and the Londoners, and a great number of the nobles of the kingdom, who assembled from day to day, with whom also was Ralph, earl of Chester. Against these there was raised a murmuring of those in the army, who dreaded some treachery. He therefore went over to the besieged; but the siege being continued for a long period, the multitude were oppressed by famine. Two hundred soldiers were then sent out with Robert, natural son of Eda,² and king Henry, and John Marshal,³ in order to convey into the city those who were bringing provisions for the service of the empress and the besieged. William de Ypres and a portion of the army pursuing them to Warewell (where is a convent of nuns), seized both the troops and the whole store, which was abundant. Tidings of those events reached those who were in the city, who, considering that their hope of safety lay in retreat rather than in combat, marched out, lest the victors under William de Ypres, who were returning to their allies, having gathered confidence by their daily successes, might perchance lay schemes to surprise them. Nor was the empress rescued without hard fighting and extreme difficulty. Geoffrey Boterel, the brother of Alan, earl of Richmond, won great renown in her defence, for he rallied the last of his company, and nobly sustained and vigorously repelled the assaults of the enemy. The king of Scotland, having lost almost all his men, barely escaped, and made a precipitate retreat to his kingdom. For a certain godson of his, David Holifard, a comrade of those who besieged the city of Winchester, secreted him ; so that those who were in eager search of the king did not discover him. Earl Robert was intercepted and captured at the pass of a certain bridge. And not long afterwards, that is, about the feast of St. Martin [12th Nov.], by the deliberate agreement of both parties, king Stephen was restored to the kingdom, and earl Robert set at liberty with his men.

The legate Henry, bishop of Winchester, remitted to the judgment of the apostolic sovereign, William, the archbishop elect of York. For William, abbot of Rievaulx, Richard, second abbot of Fountains, Cuthbert, prior of Gisburn, Wallefus, prior of Kirkham, and Robert Hospitalis, charged him with having achieved that dignity by a pecuniary agreement. Also Robert Biseth, prior of Hexham, on hearing of his election, quitted at once his house and his brethren, and gave himself up to the religious life under Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux.

A. D. 1143. Richard was confirmed prior of Hexham, according to the election of the brethren, by the hand of William the dean, and the chapter of York, since at that time the cause of William, archbishop elect of York, was being heard in the consistory of pope Innocent. Master Walter, archdeacon of London, was also present as the bearer of the written charges of the abbots and priors against him. A decree at length was given, that, on the third Sunday in Lent of the following year, both those who were then present and those who were absent should assemble there. William Paniel, commander of the soldiers in Nottingham, marched a troop of soldiers to Southwell, with intent to break down the wall wherewith the enclosures of the church of St. Mary were protected, and to carry off the spoil. A great assemblage of the province, who had rushed thither for the defence of the place, acted courageously. There also fell by an arrow-shot one of the soldiers of the enemy's army, who was speaking in a boastful manner against that place. So this William went to the empress, in order that when he returned with a large force of soldiers, he might storm the place ; but, behold ! in the darkness of the night, by the contrivance of two youths who had charge of the mills, the soldiers of William Peverel scaled the rock on which the citadel was built, and obtained possession of the town, and expelled from Nottingham all who were in favour of the empress. After Easter [4th April], king Stephen, followed by his queen Matilda, came to York, and put an end to the passages of arms which were being carried on between William, earl of York, and Alan, earl of Richmond. And he had a design to go and avenge his former injuries, and to restore the kingdom to its ancient dignity and integrity ; but being seized with illness, he disbanded the military force which he had levied. At this period Robert de Brus died. Also William Cumin having, by the presentation of the empress, become master of the episcopal property of Durham, grievously harassed very many : his conduct savoured somewhat of the tyrant. Ralph, archdeacon of Durham, nephew of Ralph, bishop of Durham, a man of eminent virtue in these ecclesiastical difficulties, took his departure, choosing exile in preference to submitting to the intrusion by which William Cumin aimed at the episcopal dignity. Roger, prior of the same church, speedily followed him, a man of most revered worth, instructed from his earliest years in monastic discipline. Not long after, divine service was interdicted in the church of Durham, and all worship of God ceased in it.

A. D. 1144. According to the order of the apostolic decree, William, abbot of Rievaulx, Richard, the second abbot of Fountains, Cuthbert, prior of Gisburn, Wallevus, prior of Kirkham, and Robert Hospitalis, were at Rome, with whom were Walter, archdeacon of London, and William, precentor of York. William the elect was also there with his supporters, against whom those who had charged him proceeded to a trial before the pope. The sum of their complaint appeared to lie in this, that William, earl of York, commanded, as the representative of the king in the chapter of York, that this William should be elected. The pope therefore decreed, that if William, dean of York, would swear that this order of the king was never brought by the earl before the chapter, he might be duly admitted to consecration, provided also that he would give a pledge in his own person that he had not sought this preferment by bribery. It was likewise ruled that, in place of the dean, another approved person might be substituted to take the oath. Roger, the prior of Durham, and Ralph, the archdeacon, sent a deputation to the pope, and laid before him the afflictions of the church of Durham. Armed with his authority, they summoned to meet them at York, in the chapel of St. Andrew (which is within the church of St. Peter), a few of the clergy of the diocese of Durham, whom they could with difficulty collect, in the middle of Lent, on account of the persecution of William Cumin. All these agreed in the election of William, the archdeacon of York, who at that time was taking part in a council at London; for he was a man of great age, worthy of the episcopal dignity from his learned acquirements, his discretion of mind, and uprightness of life. Meeting him on his return at Wintringham, on the river Humber, and taking him into the church, they laid before him the business of their deliberation; and although he greatly resisted and opposed, they confirmed the agreement of their choice in him by the invocation of the divine favour. A delay took place as to his promotion, because the legate Henry, bishop of Winchester, had crossed over into Normandy. At his return, about Whitsuntide, the bishop elect, with the clergy of Durham, went to Winchester, where the consent of the legate being obtained, and through him that of the king, on the octaves of St. John Baptist [1st July], nine bishops assisting, he was consecrated with due solemnity in the church of St. Swithin. The pope placed William Cumin under anathema, and his archdeaconry, which he had in the church of Worcester, was given to another, without hope of recovery. He, exasperated by these punishments, assailed like a most savage spoiler all the clergy and laity on whom he could lay hands, and exhausted the whole treasure of the province; neither prince nor noble could repress his violence. There was, however, a certain soldier, Roger de Coincneriis, a good and faithful man, who would not consent to share in the deeds of William Cumin. Wherefore on his property, to wit, at Bishopton, he fortified a little stronghold, because the place was suitable, being surrounded by a marsh. In this bishop William was entertained, and was plunged in grief because he saw the people and affairs of the bishopric thus harassed. Earl Henry, son of the king of Scotland, and Alan, earl of Richmond, corrupted by the bribes of William Cumin, had often deceived the bishop by vain professions. This bishop came with a large train to Durham, striving to surround the church of St. Giles with a trench, in order that he might hold that place for his defence. And the monks who were within it had prepared a secret passage, by which they designed to introduce the bishop with his men. The matter became known to William Cumin, who, making an attack with his armed followers, burst violently into the monastery, and, finding the monks prostrate in distress of mind around the body of St. Cuthbert, he ordered them to be put to death, though to this no one would agree. He placed there guards and arms. In these times very many, in numerous places, inflicted similar injuries upon churches and ecclesiastical persons. For Geoffrey de Magnavilla, having ejected the monks from the monastery of Ramesby, desecrated it by converting it into a castle. William, earl of York, troubled by the hostility of Ralph, earl of Chester, and Gilbert de Ghent, converted the monastery of St. Mary, at Brellinton, into a castle. Alan, earl of Richmond, likewise, with some armed men, breaking into the church at Ripon, rudely insulted archbishop William, beside the body of St. Wilfrid. This archbishop William, returning in the month of September from his foreign travel, according to the apostolic decree, appeared at Winchester for the judgment of the legate, the nobles of the clergy of England sitting together with him. The affection of the multitude was urgent in his favour, they not so much requesting as demanding his consecration; and no one appeared there who ventured to object anything against him. William, bishop of Durham, being summoned to this convention, sent a reply, excusing himself on account of the pressing disturbances of William Cumin. In his place, Ralph Nuel, bishop of Orkney, Severinus, abbot of York, and Benedict, abbot of Whitby, stood up to answer for the elect. William, archbishop of York, was therefore consecrated by the legate, namely, Henry, bishop of Winchester, on the sixth of the kalends of October [26th Sept.], numbers rejoicing at his promotion. In this year died pope Innocent. In his room was substituted Celestinus, a man of great age, who had designs somewhat beyond his power against Roger, king of Sicily, on account of that same Sicily which belonged by right to the pope. He had been educated amongst the inhabitants of Anjou, and designed to strengthen their hands by the abasement of king Stephen; on which ground he was excited to a dislike of Henry, bishop of Winchester. Milo, earl of Hereford, died on the eve of our Lord's Nativity [24th Dec.], being pierced with an arrow when engaged in hunting; also, Adam de Brus died.

A. D. 1145. Henry, bishop of Winchester, on his way to Rome, tarried at Clugny; and, in the meanwhile, pope Celestine died, and was succeeded by Lucius, a man of less severe temperament. The aforesaid bishop Henry found favour in his sight, and refuted the criminal charges of those whom the empress had sent against him; but, nevertheless, he did not continue to hold the title and office of legate.

At this time a young soldier, William, nephew of William Cumin, regarded by many, a man skilled in military tactics and the administration of public business, enclosed with a wall the church of St. John the Evangelist at Merrington, and there placed a garrison of soldiers. A certain young man, a mason, who built the ramparts on the walls of the church, lost his senses and died. The same soldier also was struck with disease, and suffered the penalty of death, which speedily ensued, and upon his decease the hope and confidence of William Cumin fell to the ground. Hereupon he adopted a more moderate tone, and desired to be reconciled to the bishop, before a similar vengeance should fall upon himself. Therefore, by the mediation of William the archbishop, bishop William and William Cumin agreed upon a treaty of peace to this effect, that Richard Cumin should hold of the bishop, Alverton, but that the rest of the property should be entirely given up into the hands of the bishop. This Richard was the nephew of William Cumin, brother of that William who died. So on the day of St. Luke the Evangelist [18th Oct.], the bishop was enthroned in the episcopal see by the hand of William the archbishop, and William Cumin with his train was absolved. Nevertheless, the penalty of deserved vengeance from the Lord pursued him; for some days after, a certain soldier, Robert de Mundaville, towards whom and his wife (a daughter of Geoffrey, bishop of Durham) the same William Cumin had acted iniquitously, slew a nephew of this William, Osbert, a young soldier much beloved by all who were in the service of earl Henry, son of the king of Scotland; and with him Stephen, a soldier, a man of great power, and an energetic ally of William Cumin. Also Richard de Luvetot seized William Cumin himself, and for many days afflicted him in prison with grievous pains and tortures. King Stephen besieged the empress in Oxford, seeking rather her surrender than that of the town. But she, taking advantage of the night, escaped in the snow, clothed in white robes, and sought refuge in Wallingford.

A. D. 1146. Hicmar, bishop and cardinal, sent by pope Lucius, came as legate into England, bringing the pall intended for archbishop William. But William himself, through carelessness, delayed to meet him, being engaged in other affairs of less moment, as was customary with him. For being the son of Herbert of Winchester, treasurer of king Henry, he had been brought up in luxury and wealth, and was little accustomed to exertion; nevertheless, much endeared to the populace by the kindness and liberality of a mild disposition. Then pope Lucius died, and Eugenius governed the apostolic see, an abbot of the Cistercian order, previously called Bernard. Likewise died William, first abbot of Rievaulx, held to this day among his successors in revered memory for deeds of illustrious virtue. Maurice succeeded; one brought up from childhood as a monk in the cloister of Durham, and who, from a desire of perfection, transferred himself to the rigour of the Cistercian discipline. Influenced by the same zeal for perfection, after a time he renounced the office of abbot, and Ethelred was appointed in his place, one who had obtained from the Lord an excellent grace in the preaching of wisdom. Also Richard, the second abbot of Fountains, departed this life. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, translated to the government of that place Henry Murdac, abbot of Clairvaux, of excellent family indeed, but especially excelling in temperance of living, and enriched by the gift of his parents before his monastic profession, under the venerable archbishop Turstin, with honours and riches, both in the church of York and in the adjoining province. Those, therefore, who were opposed to archbishop William, regaining confidence, assembled, and with them this Henry, relying greatly on his favour with the pope. On their pressing their appeal against the said archbishop of York, Hicmar was recalled, and returned to Rome, carrying back the pall.

A. D. 1147. William, archbishop of York, made a journey to pope Eugenius, to obtain the pall, the insignia of his office. The voices of the Roman senate were strongly in his favour; but Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, wrote against him, and the pope resolutely opposed him, as if repudiating the sin of witchcraft and the iniquity of idolatry. He was thus placed in a dilemma, since in adhering to the views of the abbot, he set at nought the opinion of the Roman cardinals. At length he pronounced the suspension of William from the episcopal office, until William, bishop of Durham, formerly dean of York, should, according to the decree of pope Innocent, put an end to this dispute by his oath. On this William, perceiving that his affairs were not prospering, went to visit his relative Roger, king of Sicily, and spent a considerable time with that king's chancellor, Robert, an Englishman, a native of Salisbury. This Robert was the most influential of the king's friends, a man of great wealth, and invested with high dignities. Enraged at William's troubles, certain soldiers of his kindred destroyed by fire a farm of the monks of Fountains, with the abundant stores there laid up. Complaint of this was made to the pope, who was very anxious to seize William, and take vengeance on him.

A quarrel having arisen at this period between Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, and Henry, bishop of Winchester, they appealed against each other to the pope, and each endeavoured to gain his favour, and that of the senate, by letters and sumptuous presents. Moreover, the archbishop suspended the bishop from the episcopal and priestly functions. Through king Stephen's influence, however, his brother, the bishop was restored to the archbishop's favour; on account of which the archbishop incurred the pope's anger for having acted without his advice, the pontiff not being favourably disposed towards king Stephen and his brother, bishop Henry. Eminent among the Roman clergy at this time was Robert Pulleyne,¹ chancellor of the apostolic see, abounding in all wisdom and knowledge, of British origin, devoted from his earliest years to philosophy, for the sake of which he rejected a bishopric offered by king Henry, and having food and clothing, was there-with content.

A.D. 1148. Louis, king of France, in his zeal for the christian faith, set forth to expel the pagan host from Jerusalem, being accompanied in his journey by his queen, Eleanor, daughter of William, duke of Aquitaine. A multitude well-nigh innumerable, moved by a similar impulse, set out from every kingdom and province of Christendom. William, earl of Warenne, perished in this expedition, being cut off by the pagans, when keeping guard in the rear of the christian army. With him illustrious princes of the continent also perished, and a very great number of men. Roger de Mowbray won renowned fame by conquering, in single combat, a pagan king. Pope Eugenius, presiding at a council¹ in France, decreed by general proclamation the deposition of William of York from the functions and benefice of the archbishopric of York. He also addressed a letter to William, bishop of Durham, and the chapter of York, requiring them, within forty days after the receipt of his epistle, to elect in his stead a man of learning, judgment, and piety. Thereupon Henry, bishop of Winchester, entertained this William on his return from Sicily, and most punctiliously rendered him the daily attendance due to an archbishop. During the whole period of his humiliation he uttered no murmur or complaint, but in the silence of his own self-possessed mind, he exercised himself in patience. He never reproached his opponents, and closed his heart and ears against those who did. None of his associates attended so constantly and assiduously to reading, or gave himself so much to preaching, for he became altogether a changed character. So, in obedience to the pope's decree, the superior clergy of the church and diocese of York assembled at St. Martin's church in the suburb of Richmond, on the eve of St. James the Apostle [24th July], to proceed to the election of an archbishop. The bishop of Durham declined to appear, on account of the hostility of William, earl of York, from whom, under penalty of excommunication, the bishop required the restoration of Ovenden and other possessions of the church of Durham, which had been wrested from him by the earl. A difference arose as to the person most proper to be elected; for Robert of Gant, the king's chancellor and dean, and Hugh of Pudsey, the king's nephew and treasurer, both of whom archbishop William had promoted to high offices in the church of York, and a party with them, united in the choice of Master Hilary, the pope's clerk. But William, bishop of Durham, Aldulf, bishop of Carlisle, William de Augo, precentor of York, the archdeacons, and the rest on their side, gave the preference to Henry Murdac, abbot of Fountains. The pope determined this question by consecrating Henry archbishop, at the city of Treves, on the octave of St. Andrew [7th Dec.], the second Sunday in Advent. Hilary, by the pope's direction, was consecrated bishop of the church of Chichester. This Hilary, when in the service of Henry, bishop of Winchester, acquired the highest praise; and when afterwards transferred to the service of the pope, he proved himself, in the pleading and prosecution of causes in the Roman court, a most fluent advocate and skilful lawyer. In this year¹ died John, bishop of Glasgow, who, on account of the excellence of his character, was held in much regard by David, king of Scotland; he was buried in the church of Jedburgh, where he had established a convent of regular clergy. In his room was elected Herbert, abbot of Kelso, also an energetic man; he was consecrated by pope Eugenius at Auxerre. Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, died; also Robert, earl of Gloucester, an illegitimate son of king Henry.

A. D. 1149. Malachy, archbishop of Ireland, full of faith and of the Holy Spirit, by direction of the pope made a journey through England, doing good to multitudes by his wholesome teaching in the word of doctrine; he then went to Clairvaux, where, falling ill, he made a most blessed end, resting in the Lord on the fourth of the nones of November [2d Nov.]. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, has given a faithful narrative² of his manner of life from his early years, how he “fed the flock of the Lord in the integrity of his heart, and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.” (Psal. lxxviii. 72.) Robert, bishop of Hereford, also died abroad, being taken ill on a visit to the pope; his clergy, out of regard for his worthy and devout life, had him conveyed thence and interred at his episcopal see. At this time the city of Lisbon in Spain was besieged and taken by assault by the Christians; who, driving out the heathen there, revived the episcopal see. Henry, archbishop of York, came to England; but king Stephen and the city of York refused to acknowledge him, and a grievous disturbance took place there; for whoever attempted to leave the city to join him, if he fell into the hands of the citizens, was expelled with torture and confiscation of his property. The revenues of the states were appropriated to the king’s exchequer, and the retainers of St. Peter were subjected to violence and spoliation. Archbishop Henry retired to Ripon, and pronounced sentence of excommunication on the treasurer, Hugh Pudsey, and the inhabitants of the city of York. He inflicted the same penalty likewise on William, earl of York, and the whole of his opponents. But Hugh the treasurer, having command of the church of York, allowed none of the ecclesiastical services to be neglected, and with equal readiness caused archbishop Henry and his adherents to be excommunicated. This affair created shameful discord and angry contention in the archbishopric. William, bishop of Durham, received archbishop Henry with due respect; and when he came to king David at Carlisle, Adulf, bishop of that city, treated him with equal reverence. At this time Henry, bishop of Winchester, having gone to Rome, with profuse expense and great show of opulence, effectually secured himself before the pope from the menaces of his enemies. At his request the pope wrote to archbishop Henry, desiring him to deal more gently with his nephew, Hugh Pudsey. This Hugh the treasurer, in the meanwhile, defended with a military force the episcopal possessions and the castle of Winchester, himself taking part in the fight. On his removal to this distance, his associates became more moderate in their opposition to archbishop Henry.

A. D. 1150. Henry, son of Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, and the empress Adela, came to Carlisle at Easter [15th April], where king David entertained him with great respect and sumptuous provision of costly munificence. He conferred on him the order of knighthood, assisted by his son Henry, and Ralph, earl of Chester. The said Ralph laid aside the animosity with which he had been wont to claim Carlisle as of hereditary right, and did homage to king David. It was agreed between them, that instead of Carlisle he should have the lordship of Lancaster, and earl Ralph's son should marry one of the daughters of Henry, son of the king of Scotland. At this time king Stephen came to York, and gave up to the citizens to be destroyed the fortress of Coldric; for, on account of the fear of the townsfolk, who did not dare to enter or leave the city on that side, they induced the king to come thither by the promise of a large sum of money. Also king David and the young Henry, duke of Normandy, and Ralph, earl of Chester, formed a joint design to act with their united forces against king Stephen. King David, accompanied by the said Henry, marched with his troops to Lancaster, where also earl Ralph promised to meet them with his levies; but, retracting all that he had undertaken, he abandoned this project. Duke Henry in consequence returned to his own country, and occupied himself in military exercises, being a man of powerful frame, and in disposition possessing somewhat of the gravity of age. Between him and king Stephen's son Eustace there was a rivalry in excellence, for they both aimed at the sovereignty of the same kingdom. Upon Eustace his father conferred the dignity of knighthood with great pomp, supported by the kindness and liberality of his brother Henry, bishop of Winchester. At the instigation of the citizens of York, king Stephen went to Beverley, and imposed a fine on the people of that place, who had dared without his leave to receive into their town the archbishop Henry. But he was withheld from erecting a fortress there, being alarmed by an apparition of St. John and his threatenings. Returning then to York, he taxed separately the principal men, according to the station of each and his amount of wealth. The kingdom also suffered great loss; for each man, according to his own artifice, debased the value of money and coin.

After the king's departure his son Eustace went to York, and finding the sacred offices discontinued there, he compelled the clergy to fulfil all the divine services. Upon this archbishop Henry eagerly wrote a complaint to the pope. In the same year Robert de Chesney, archdeacon of the church of Lincoln, being elevated to the government of that church, was consecrated bishop. Also Louis, king of France, returned to his throne from his expedition to Jerusalem.

A. D. 1151. Robert de Sigillo, bishop of London, who had devoutly discharged his episcopal duties, died from eating poisoned grapes at a banquet. Many learned men of great reputation, who partook of the same meal, died also. He was succeeded by Richard, archdeacon of London, a man possessed of admirable eloquence, but his latter days were full of sorrow; for, becoming dumb for many years, he at last died a melancholy death. Gilbert, bishop of Lisbon, preached in England, and stirred up a great many to undertake an expedition to Spain, to attack and storm Seville. About this time Ralph, earl of Chester, being detected in an attempt to renew some of his former treacheries against Stephen, was placed in close confinement; and being subjected to great severity and distress, he restored to the king Lincoln and his other strongholds. Some time after, on giving his nephew, Gilbert de Clare, as a hostage, he was set at liberty; but repudiated all his engagements, and placed his hostage in peril. And being troubled on account of his fortresses, of which he had been deprived, he, by way of remedy, conceived the design of recalling duke Henry from Normandy to England, promising him his assistance in acquiring the kingdom and the concurrence of numbers. Henry, duke of Normandy, therefore, came to England, and entered a church near the shore, to offer his devotions. Immediately on entering the church he presented himself to the priest, and received before all, from the celebrant of the holy mysteries, the kiss of peace offered by him. Robert, earl of Leicester, took his side, and some of the better-disposed nobles of the kingdom, perceiving in him the wisdom of God in executing judgment; but all those who desired to have liberty to follow their own rash devices shrank from him. Hugh de Pudsey, treasurer of York, being absolved at Jarum¹ from his excommunication, was received into the favour of archbishop Henry. Also king Stephen's son, Eustace, having had a private interview with archbishop Henry, laid aside all his hostility.

A. D. 1152. King Stephen and archbishop Henry became reconciled, and all hostility between them was laid aside on either part. On the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul [25th Jan.], the said archbishop was installed in his see with great pomp. He offered upon the altar the grants (which he had recovered) of dignities, liberties, and immunities, bestowed in former times by the popes upon the church of York; and he prohibited, under pain of excommunication, any one from daring again to alienate them from that church; for archbishop William had pledged to the money-lenders both the grants and many other valuables out of the treasury of the church of York, to defray the expenses which he had incurred in his journey to Rome. Then, having settled to his satisfaction the affairs of the church of York, archbishop Henry very soon went to Rome, and kept the feast of Easter [30th March] with pope Eugenius, having been despatched as ambassador to him on the business of the king and realm, of which the chief matter was, that the king's son, Eustace, might be established by papal authority as heir to the throne. At this time John, a priest cardinal, landed at Tynemouth in Northumberland, going as legate from the apostolic see with palls sent to the Irish bishops. William, bishop of Durham, received him with reverence. But he wrote to David, king of Scotland, reporting himself and the cause of his arrival, and asking from him a convoy to Ireland. And the king at that time, with his army, established his nephew William, son of Duncan, in the lordship of Skipton and Craven, and stormed a fortress which had been constructed by the enemy, and having expelled the garrison, he overthrew it. The Scotch there committed the crime of plundering churches, for which the king atoned by presenting to each church a silver chalice. The king hastened to Carlisle on receiving the lord cardinal's letter, sending on his chancellor to meet him at the church of Hexham; for the cardinal was nobly entertained, and with him one of the Irish bishops. When the cardinal arrived, about the feast of St. Michael [29th Sept.], the king and his son, earl Henry, dutifully received him, and sought his favour by costly and devoted attentions. Departing thence to Ireland, he distributed four palls to certain sees, and administered much correction to that nation, who did not conform to the law of marriage; but this cardinal priest had come in the previous year to the king of England, who refused to grant him a convoy, unless he would give his promise that in this expedition he would compass nothing to the injury of the kingdom of England. Resenting this language, the cardinal returned to the pope, and the Roman court was on this account ill-affected to the king. Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, a powerful prince and very skilful in the administration of state affairs, died, leaving his son Henry, duke of Normandy, heir to his virtue and rank, who received also, in augmentation of his possession, the duchy of Aquitaine. For a divorce having taken place, on account of consanguinity, between Louis, king of France, and his queen Eleanor, Henry took her in marriage with the aforesaid duchy, she being the sole heiress of duke William her father.

A. D. 1153. The priest cardinal legate John, having accomplished the object of his mission in Ireland, returned after Easter [19th April] to king David, who was endeared to him by strong affection on account of his devoted and reverential services. King Stephen, repenting himself of his former want of courtesy, invited the cardinal to come to him, promising that he would atone for his previous offence. At this time died Matilda, queen of England, wife of king Stephen, and was buried at the royal vill of Feversham, where she had established a body of monks and their residence. After Easter, her cousin earl Henry, son of David, king of Scotland, departed this life, a prince of a gentle disposition, a well-mannered and God-fearing man, abounding in charity to the poor; he was buried in the monks' monastery at Kelso, near Roxburgh, which David his father had founded. King David, suppressing his grief at the death of his niece, the queen of England, and of his only son, without delay took his son's firstborn Malcolm, and placing him under the care of earl Duncan, with a numerous escort caused this youth to be conducted through the provinces of Scotland, and proclaimed heir to the throne. Accompanied by his younger son William, he went to Newcastle, and taking pledges of all the chiefs of Northumberland, he subjected them to the young man's government. Theobald, earl palatine, also deceased, nephew of king Henry and brother of king Stephen, a founder of many religious houses, liberal to pilgrims and the poor, a peaceful and upright prince, who had rendered great political service to the whole realm of France. Henry, archbishop of York, went to the church of Hexham, and spent a considerable portion of the summer in its territory. He made a complaint at Carlisle to king David, that his forests had been ravaged by the king's men who were employed in working the silver mines. Animated by zeal for good order, he laboured when there to enjoin upon the canons of that church a very strict observance of certain regulations. He also inducted regular canons to the prebends of the church of St. Oswald at Gloucester, appointing as their prior Unfred, a literate and monk of the monastery of Lanthony. With regard to the prebends of the church of St. John of Beverley, he also entertained the same design as]the deceased archbishop Turstin; which, however, his death speedily occurring, he was unable to accomplish. In this year William, bishop of Durham, of blessed memory, died on the ides of November [13th Nov.]. Immediately upon his death, the clergy and laity of the bishopric of Durham were involved in an accumulation of troubles; for the clergy made every effort to evade the mandates and injunctions of archbishop Henry, and to provide a bishop for themselves, without incurring his condemnation, of which they stood greatly in awe. Also, Roger de Conyers, who, in the room of his lately deceased father Roger, held the rule of the castle and territory of Durham, desiring, like a young man, to add to the pomp of his military array, laid the men of the bishopric under heavy pecuniary exaction, and was too often the cause of their being plundered by others.

A. D. 1154. At Durham, on the feast of St. Vincent the martyr [22d Jan.], prior Lawrence, Wazo and Ralph, archdeacons, and the whole of the clergy, agreed in the election of Hugh, treasurer of York, and by their emissaries, archdeacon Wazo, and Nicholas, prior of Brinkburn, at once announced the event to archbishop Henry at Beverley. But the archbishop, disapproving of the election, denied the messengers access to him, and at daybreak celebrated a mass of the Holy Spirit, and excommunicated the prior and archdeacons. This rejection aroused great excitement against the archbishop, so that on the first day of Lent [17th Feb.], the prior and archdeacons of Durham, and Master Lawrence and prior Nicholas, whom he had also excommunicated, assembled before the archbishop at York, demanding that they should be absolved, and contending that their election was firmly supported by the force of the canons. The citizens of York, also, arose with them in complaint, charging him with contempt of the royal prerogative. The archbishop in consequence hastily left the city, and never entered it again to the day of his death; and not even at the entreaties of the king's son Eustace, who came to him at Beverley, would he depart from this determination. During these events Hugh, the bishop-elect, abode in the south of England, and took no part in this contention. And, indeed, the clergy of Durham, seeing that the archbishop enjoyed the pope's favour, did not venture to call to their support either the king or any one else. At length, after many difficulties, they were absolved by aid of the recommendation of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, to the pope's legate. In the month of August Hugh came to York, and the archbishop being opposed to him, the chapter did not dare to offer him counsel or aid. He therefore went with the clergy of Durham to present himself to the pope, furnished with recommendations from archbishop Theobald and other persons of high estimation in England. But Master Laurence leaving them, embraced the monastic profession at St. Alban's; from whence, a few years after, he was elevated by king Henry to preside over the monks of Westminster on the deposition of abbot Gervase, son of king Stephen, who in youthful wantonness had wasted the property of that establishment. In the same year David, king of Scotland, worn down by infirmity, died at Carlisle, whose memory is blessed through all generations. There has been no prince like him in our days, devoted to sacred duties, observing every day the canonical hours, and never omitting to attend the masses for the departed. He was remarkable for the wise and courageous spirit by which he skilfully restrained the fierceness of his barbarous nation, for his frequent washing the feet of the poor, and for his compassion in feeding and clothing them, for that he founded the monasteries of Saltehou,¹ Melrose, Newbottle, Holmcultram, Jedburgh, Crag, and those situated on this side of the Scottish sea, endowing them with lands and revenues for their maintenance; besides other good deeds which he performed in Scotland and elsewhere. He bestowed his liberality moreover on foreign nations, on pilgrims, on religious and secular. I might proudly tell of the daily abstemiousness in food and vesture, of the holiness and virtue of his conduct, and the moral discipline by which he rendered himself an example even to monastic men. He reigned twenty-nine years; his corpse was taken to Dunfermline, and interred in the tomb of the kings of Scotland, where also rested his mother, the sainted queen Margaret. It is said that the sea adjoining Dunfermline was chafed with tempestuous squalls of wind, threatening shipwreck to those who attempted to cross with the corpse; but when the king's body was placed in the vessel, the sea immediately became calm; and when the body was disembarked on the opposite shore, the sea was again agitated by the renewed violence of the storm.

After this the whole population of the land accepting Malcolm, son of earl Henry, king David's son, as is the custom of that nation, appointed this boy, scarcely twelve years old, king over Scotland, in place of his grandfather David. Of him it may truly be said, "With their seed shall good things continue, and their children shall be a holy inheritance." [Ecclus. xlv. 11.] Northumberland was under the dominion of his brother William. King

Stephen's son, Eustace, died, and Henry, bishop of Winchester, strenuously exerted himself to promote the interests of duke Henry. Through his mediation his brother, king Stephen, and duke Henry concluded a stipulation for the establishment of peace, oaths being given and received on each side. It was agreed between them that duke Henry should manage the affairs of the realm, and be acknowledged heir to the throne after king Stephen; and that in all disputed points in the kingdom, Henry himself should yield to Henry bishop of Winchester, as to a father. He also was to yield to Henry the rule of the affairs of state, reserving to king Stephen's son William, with the earldom of Warren, that which belonged to him of hereditary right, to wit, two earldoms in England. To this agreed all the nobles of the kingdom, and those who had opposed king Stephen now submitted to him. An edict was immediately promulgated by them for the suppression of outrages, the prohibition of spoliations, the dismissal from the kingdom of mercenary soldiers and archers of foreign nations, and the destruction of the fortresses which, since the death of king Henry, every one had built upon his own property. Justice and peace were thus everywhere restored to the kingdom. Simon Saint Liz, earl of Northampton, and Ralph, earl of Chester, died. Pope Eugenius died, and was succeeded by Anastasius, a very old man. Bernard also, abbot of Clairvaux, whom the anointing of the Spirit instructed in all things, departed this life. Also Henry, archbishop of York, died at Beverley, on the day before the ides of October [14th Oct.]. His corpse was conveyed to York, and deposited in the burial-place of the prelates of that church.

THE ACTS OF KING STEPHEN, AND THE BATTLE OF THE STANDARD.

HERE BEGINS THE HISTORY OF RICHARD, PRIOR OF THE CHURCH OF HEXHAM, OF PIOUS MEMORY, CONCERNING THE ACTS OF KING STEPHEN, AND THE BATTLE OF THE STANDARD.

A. D. 1135. IN the year of the incarnate Word 1135, sixty-nine years after the invasion of England by the Normans, Henry, king of England, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, was seized with illness, occasioned by eating some lampreys, and died at St. Denis, in a forest of Normandy called Leuns, on Monday, the fourth of the nones of December [2d Dec.]. He had an illustrious reign of thirty-five years and four months. His body, in compliance with his own directions, was conveyed to England, and buried at Reading. Justice and peace, which had so long ruled with him, perished in like manner with him both in Normandy and England; and the defence of justice (which at that time everywhere held sole rule) being removed, in the place of peace and justice, violence and rapine, slaughter and devastation, unheard-of cruelties and endless calamities, tyrannized far and wide. After his death all these evils raged the more freely and fiercely, in proportion to the stern force and strict justice by which in his lifetime so many had been overthrown, kept under, despoiled, disinherited, and exiled. Seizing from this event the opportunity so ardently longed for, each one hastened to avenge himself whilst it lay in his power, to effect whatever mischief he could. At this period William, surnamed Transversus, who by a grant from king Henry held the lordship of Pontefract, (as the town is called,) having received at that place a mortal wound from a knight named Pain, died three days afterwards, having assumed the monastic habit. Then Ilbert de Lacy, the son, regained the lordship of which king Henry had deprived his father, Robert de Lacy; and many similar cases occurred at that time throughout England and Normandy. In his youth the noble king Henry was distinguished for his honourable bearing; he had frequently undergone the trial of adverse circumstances, and was well practised in martial conflicts. He was a man of counsel and foresight, sagacity and prudence, firm in mind, courageous in spirit, truthful in speech, faithful to his promises, resolute in his threats, steadfast in friendship, persistent in hatred, patient in adversity, moderate in prosperity, fluent in oratory, stern in justice, equitable in judgment, a bitter foe to his opponents, a warm friend to his allies. Having, on the death of his brother William, acquired the throne of England, he (by marvellous cunning) obtained from his brother, earl Robert, the dukedom of Normandy, and managed the affairs of both states with great ability, and, with a policy which cannot be described, he gained the ascendancy over all who were unfavourable to him. He put down many men of high rank on account of their bad faith, and loaded with high honours many of humble birth who proved honest and loyal to him. He also revived the good laws¹ and customs of his predecessor and relative, king Edward; and when they were amended, as he saw fit, by his wisdom, and confirmed by his authority, he caused them to be strictly and constantly observed by rich as well as poor throughout his kingdom. Moreover, he visited with severe punishment thieves and robbers, plunderers and evildoers, forgers of base coin, and wild prodigals. Thus in his days was a bright season of peace, and many monasteries were changed to the profession of monks, and especially of the regular canons, where previously there had been none. He indeed founded, and with regal munificence endowed, two convents, one of monks at Reading, where he desired to be buried, and the other of canons at Cirencester, and appointed to both abbots of their respective orders. The monastery at Reading he favoured with his patronage, and in a conspicuous place he built a church of very beautiful workmanship, and furnished it with princely revenues, and a numerous choir of monks. The convent of Cirencester he founded four years before his death, and established there regular canons, whom he provided with abundant supplies. He was distinguished for his admirable bounty and due regard towards religious and poor. None of his successors so strongly prohibited as he unjust extortions in the realm, or so skilfully disposed all to quiet subjection and orderly behaviour; none so piously regarded the clergy, or provided with such sumptuous beneficence for the poor and needy.

He had two queens; the first, named Matilda, was a daughter of Malcolm, king of Scotland, and by her he had one daughter, who married first the emperor Henry of Germany, and afterwards Geoffrey, earl of Anjou. By this queen he had also one son, called William, who perished at sea, with the principal nobility of England and Normandy. After the death of Matilda he married a second queen, named Adeliza, the daughter of Godfrey, duke of Lovaine, by whom he had no issue. But, through fornication and adultery, he had several children; for these two vices, sensuality and covetousness, had too much the rule over him, and hence many were depraved by his bad example. Being in Normandy a little before his death, he partook of some lampreys, which speedily brought on an illness of which he died, as was before stated. On his demise, immediately there arose wicked men and sinners, setting at nought all the rules of justice and of order, and fiercely giving themselves up to devastations and slaughters, incendiarism and every other form of crime. For (as we have said), in the commencement of his reign, he had given the people just laws and liberties.

established them by charter, confirmed them by his seal, and directed them to be laid up in his treasury at Winchester, as the following document will clearly show :—

“ Henry,¹ by the grace of God, king of the English, to all his faithful people, whether French-born or English, throughout all England, wisheth greeting.

“ Know ye that by the mercy of God, and the united will of the barons of the kingdom of England, I have been crowned king of this realm. And forasmuch as the kingdom has been oppressed by unjust extortions, I, from reverence to God and the love which I bear towards you all, in the first place, acknowledge the freedom of God’s holy church; so that I will neither sell it, nor let it out to farm, nor on the death of an archbishop, bishop, or abbot, will I receive anything from the domain, or from the vassals of the church, until his successor shall be installed. And I hereby abolish all the evil practices by which the kingdom of England has been unrighteously oppressed, and some of those evil practices I here specify. If any of my barons, or earls, or others who hold under me shall die, his heir shall not redeem his land, as the practice was in the time of my brother, but shall relieve it by a just and legal payment. And in like manner the vassals of my barons shall relieve their lands from their lords by a just and legal payment. And if any of my barons or other vassals shall desire to give in marriage his daughter, sister, niece, or other relative, he shall consult me thereupon; but neither will I receive anything from him for this permission, nor will I prevent him from bestowing her in marriage, unless he desire to unite her to my enemy. And if, on the death of a baron or other vassal, a daughter shall be left an heiress, I will bestow her with her possessions by the advice of my barons. And if, on the death of a husband, his wife shall be left without children, she shall have her dowry and her marriage settlement, and I will not give her in marriage without her own consent; but if the wife be left with children, she shall have her dowry and her marriage settlement while she keeps her body in due order, and I will not give her in marriage without her own consent; and either the wife, or other of the relatives to whom it justly pertains, shall be the guardian of the children’s property. And I order my barons to act in a similar manner to the sons, or daughters, or wives of their vassals. From henceforth I utterly prohibit the common coinage of money, which was taken throughout the cities and counties, which was not in the time of king Edward; and if any one, either coiner or other, be apprehended with base coin, let strict justice be done upon him. I remit all the pleas and the debts which were owing to my brother, excepting only my legal farms, and excepting those which were contracted for the inheritances of others, or for those properties which of right pertained to others. And if any one had made an agreement for his own inheritance, I remit that and all those reliefs which were contracted for rightful inheritances. And if any of my barons or vassals shall fall sick, in whatsoever manner he shall grant or by will dispose of his property, I confirm the deed. But if dying suddenly by violence or sickness, he shall not grant or dispose of his property, his wife, or his children, or his relatives and lawful vassals, shall divide it for the good of his soul, as to them shall seem best. But if he shall have been convicted of treason or crime, he shall thus make satisfaction. If any of my barons or vassals shall become amenable to the law, he shall not give security of his money at the will of his lord, as he did in the time of my father and brother, but he shall make satisfaction according to the nature of his crime, as satisfaction was made before my father's time, in the days of my other predecessors. All murders perpetrated before the day of my coronation I pardon; and all which shall be henceforward committed, shall be legally atoned for according to the law of king Edward. The forests, by the united consent of my barons, I retain in my own hand, as my father held them. To knights who do military service for their lands, I, by my own gift, grant the lands of their own domains to be free from all tribute and work; so that being freed from so heavy a burden, they may so fully equip themselves with horses and arms, as to be ready and prepared for my service and the defence of my kingdom. I establish a firm peace in the whole of my kingdom, and order it to be henceforth kept. I grant you the law of king Edward, with the amendments made by my father with the advice of his barons. If any one since the death of my brother William has taken anything from me, or from the property of another, the whole shall be immediately restored without a fine; but if any one after this shall retain any such property, he in whose possession it is found shall make heavy satisfaction to me.

Let what has been thus briefly told concerning him suffice for the present. If any one desires to know his acts more at length, and how he conducted himself in his kingdom, he may find it in the histories of the transactions of the English. Henry was succeeded in his throne by Stephen, earl of Boulogne, his nephew, by his sister the countess of Blois, and the brother of earl Theobald.

A. D. 1136. Stephen, earl of Boulogne, being chosen by the nobles of the kingdom, with the sanction of the clergy and people, was crowned king at London on Christmas-day, by William, archbishop of Canterbury. The beginning and course of his reign was overwhelmed with so many and so violent discordant commotions, that how to describe them, or what may be their termination, no one can yet know. The king himself, however, although straitened on every side by calamities numberless and extreme, preserved ever a firm courage and a cheerful countenance; and, as if already sure of ultimate victory, smiled at the threats and endeavours of his foes, the artifices of the designing, the perfidy of traitors, and the loss of worldly possessions, however great, as if he did not feel them, or counted them for nothing. This confidence and assurance on his part filled his enemies with amazement and confusion, but inspired his friends with energy, boldness, and comfort. He was a man also of so much kindness and good nature, that his very enemies were attracted to his side, and experienced from him a degree of kindness beyond their expectation. From this cause he succeeded in levying large masses of subsidiary troops, by means of whom he effected his objects in Normandy and England. For Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, (who had married king Henry's daughter, the empress, as she was called after her marriage with the emperor,) to whose son England and Normandy had been assigned by oath, so soon as he was aware that Stephen was chosen king, devastated and laid waste many districts, and took and maintained, in opposition to him, many fortresses in Normandy. Likewise also died David, king of Scotland, the uncle of the same lady, who, about Christmas, seized and held with a strong force five towns in the province of Northumbria; to wit, Lugubalia, called in English Carlisle, Carrum, by the English called Wark, Alnwick, Norham, and Newcastle; but he altogether failed to take Bambrough. He received from the chiefs and nobles of that locality vows and pledges of fidelity to his niece, the empress. It was his design to attack Durham also, but king Stephen with a large force arrived there on Ash-Wednesday (which that year fell on the nones of February) [5th Feb.], and remained there fifteen days. At length a conference was held in that province, and a treaty being concluded between the two kings, Henry, son of David, king of Scotland, did homage to king Stephen at York. With his father's earldom of Huntingdon the king gave him Carlisle and Doncaster, with all their appurtenances; and according to the account of some, who state that they were present at that convention, he promised him that if he purposed to bestow upon any one the earldom of Northumberland, he would first cause the claim which Henry, son of the king of Scotland, might have upon it, to be fairly adjudicated in his court. King David restored to Stephen, king of England, four of the aforesaid castles which he had seized; for the fifth, namely, Carlisle, had been ceded to him, an agreement with pledges being concluded by the subjects on each side. At the Easter following [22d March], Henry, son of the king of Scotland, was present at the court which Stephen, king of England, held in state at London, being there received with the highest honours, and placed at table on the king's right hand. On account of this, William, archbishop of Canterbury, withdrew from court, and some of the nobles of England, enraged at the king, gave vent to their disapprobation in the presence of Henry himself. David, king of Scotland, was highly indignant at this, and on his son's return, refused to allow him again to visit the king's court, though frequently invited.

In this year the Welsh ravaged a great portion of the land of Stephen, king of England, and cut off by stratagem in their country two of his barons, Richard Fitz-Roger and Pain Fitz-John; they afterwards, however, made peace with him. In the same year, also, Baldwin de Redvers, disappointed at not obtaining a barony which the king had promised him, fortified against him his town of Exeter; but the king laid his land waste, and after a lengthened siege took the town by storm, and having made him prisoner, banished him from England and Normandy; he took refuge, however, with Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, and his wife the empress.

In this year also, Innocent, pontiff of the see of Rome, sent to Stephen, king of England, a letter, in which he confirmed him by apostolic authority in the sovereignty of England. The following is a copy:—

“Innocent, bishop, the servant of the servants of God, to his well-beloved son in Christ, the illustrious Stephen, king of the English, health and the apostolic benediction.

“The King of kings and Lord of lords, in whose hand are all the powers and rights of all kingdoms, in the unfathomable dispensation of his divine providence, changes times and transfers kingdoms at his will, as saith the prophet, ‘The Most High God ruleth in the kingdom of men, and appointeth over it whomsoever He will.’ [Dan. iv. 17.] What blessings, what happy tranquillity, what just severity, abounded in the kingdom of England and dukedom of Normandy, under the rule of our son of glorious memory, king Henry, have been made clearly evident since he has been removed from earthly concerns. For being a favourer of religious men, a lover of peace and justice, a kind comforter of widows and orphans, a defender of those who were powerless to defend themselves, since his decease (as we have been informed) religion has been unsettled in the kingdom of England, no law enforcing peace or justice has been available for the king’s assistance, and impunity has attended the most atrocious crimes. But, in order that such dire ferocity may not continue to swell and rage against God’s people, the mercy of divine love has listened to the prayers of the religious, and mightily set itself against such enormities; and has therefore brought it to pass, that by the united voice and common consent both of nobles and people, you should be chosen king, and consecrated by the primates of the kingdom, as is certified to us by the letters of our venerable brethren, the archbishops and bishops of those parts, and of those lovers of the holy Roman church, the renowned king of the French and the illustrious count Theobald, as well as by the declaration of trustworthy men. Knowing that in your person the divine favour accords with the choice of men so worthy, and knowing also that for the recompence of a sure hope on the day of your consecration, you vowed obedience and reverence to St. Peter; and since you are known to be descended almost in a direct line from the royal lineage of the aforesaid kingdom, we, satisfied with what has been done in your case, receive you with fatherly affection, as a favoured son of St. Peter and of the holy Roman church, and heartily desire to retain you in the same privilege of regard and intimacy by which your predecessor of illustrious memory was by us distinguished.”

King Stephen, by these and other means, being established on the throne of England, convoked by royal proclamation an assembly of the bishops and nobles, and in conjunction with them enacted as follows :—

“ I Stephen, by the grace of God, chosen king of England by the consent of the clergy and people, having been consecrated by William, archbishop of Canterbury, legate of the holy Roman church, and confirmed by Innocent, pontiff of the holy Roman see, do from reverence and love of God acknowledge the liberty of holy church, and vow due respect to it. I promise that in the church or ecclesiastical matters, I will do or allow nothing of a simoniacal nature. I allow and maintain that the judgment and control of ecclesiastical persons and all the clergy, and the patronage of ecclesiastical benefices, is in the power of the bishops. I grant and ordain that the rights of churches confirmed by their charter, and their customs used by ancient tenure, shall remain inviolate. All the estates of churches, and the tenures which they held on the day of the decease of my grandfather, king William, I grant without bond or restriction, and exempt from all litigious claims. But if there shall still remain anything held or possessed before the death of that king now wanting to the church, I reserve the restitution or discussion of the same to my own pleasure and arbitration. I confirm whatever has been derived by them from the liberality of kings, the bounty of nobles, the oblation, conveyance, or transference of the faithful, since the demise of that king. I promise that in all things I will pursue peace and justice, and by all means in my power secure their continuance. I reserve to myself the forests which my grandfather William, and my uncle William the Second, made and held ; but all the others, which were added by king Henry, I yield and restore without cavil to the churches and kingdom. If any bishop, abbot, or other ecclesiastic, shall before his death assign or bequeath his property in a reasonable manner, I grant a confirmation of the act ; but if he shall be cut off by sudden death, it shall be assigned as the church may advise for the good of his soul. While any sees are vacant of their proper pastors, they and all their possessions shall be entrusted to the management and charge of the clergy, or approved men of that church, until a pastor be canonically appointed. I totally prohibit all extortions, injustice, and false actions, wrongfully effected either by sheriffs or others. I will observe good laws and ancient and right customs in the hundreds, and in pleas and other legal processes, and order and decree that they shall be observed. All these things I grant and confirm, saving my royal and lawful dignity.

“ The witnesses hereto are, William, archbishop of Canterbury, Hugh, archbishop of Rouen, Henry, bishop of Winchester, Roger, bishop of Salisbury, Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, Nigel, bishop of Ely, Herbert, bishop of Norwich, Simon, bishop of Worcester, Bernard, bishop of St. David's, Audoenus, bishop of Evreux, Richard, bishop of Avranches, Robert, bishop of Hereford, John, bishop of Rochester, Adewulf, bishop of Carlisle, Roger the chancellor, Henry the king's nephew, Robert, earl of Gloucester, William, earl of Warren, Ralph, earl of Chester, Roger, earl of Warwick, Robert de Vere, Milo de Gloucester, Robert de Olli, Brian, son of the earl-constable, William Martel, Hugh Bigot, Humfrey de Bohun, Simon de Beauchamp, the seneschals, William de Albini, Martel de Albini, the cup-bearers, Robert de Ferrers, William Peverel, Simon de Senlis, William de Albania, Hugh de St. Clair, Ilbert de Lacy. Dated at Oxford, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and thirty-six, and the first of my reign.”

By these and other methods, Stephen being speedily settled in the kingdom of England, gave and granted (in the first year of his reign) laws and customs of this nature to his realm, and faithfully promised that he and his followers would most strictly observe them. In the same year, in the month of August, king Stephen crossed into Normandy, on account of the war with the earl of Anjou. William, archbishop of Canterbury, died in the month of November, and was buried in his own city.

A.D. 1137. In the following year, immediately after Easter [11th April], when king David had levied his troops, he set out to lay waste Northumberland, in violation of the treaty of peace. But at the command of king Stephen, (who still remained in Normandy,) the greater part of the earls and barons of England, with a large force of soldiers, marched to Newcastle in Northumberland, being prepared to offer resistance should he invade England. At length, by means of envoys, a suspension of arms was agreed upon until the following Advent [28th Nov.], and after forty days they retired to their own quarters. On king Stephen's return from Normandy in Advent, after having, on payment of a large sum, concluded a two years' truce with the earl of Anjou, the ambassadors of David, king of Scotland, and his son Henry, speedily presented themselves, holding out a withdrawal of the armistice unless he would confer on Henry the earldom of Northumberland, but the king gave no ear to their demand.

A.D. 1138. On the fourth ides of January [10th Jan.], king David's nephew William, son of Duncan, with a portion of David's army, made a nocturnal attack upon the fortress called Carrum, in the king of England's territory, and having plundered the neighbourhood around, proceeded to storm the castle. Afterwards the king himself and his son Henry arrived with a further reinforcement, and applying the whole strength of their resources, attempted to carry the town by various assaults with battering machines and other implements, and after that laid siege to it for three weeks. Yet he gained no advantage, but, on the contrary, every attempt proved injurious to himself: for the knights and others who were in the fortress, most ably defending themselves and the town, killed his standard-bearer and many others of his men, under his own eyes, and wounded many more. The king, perceiving the inutility of his efforts, and the many and daily increasing losses to himself and his troops, at length raised the siege, and rushed with his whole force to devastate Northumberland. And then that execrable army, more atrocious than the whole race of pagans, neither fearing God nor regarding man, spread desolation over the whole province, and murdered everywhere persons of both sexes, of every age and rank, and overthrew, plundered, and burned towns, churches, and houses. For the sick on their couches, women pregnant and in childbed, infants in the womb, innocents at the breast, or on the mother's knee, with the mothers themselves, decrepit old men and worn-out old women, and persons debilitated from whatever cause, wherever they met with them, they put to the edge of the sword, and transfixed with their spears; and by how much more horrible a death they could despatch them, so much the more did they rejoice. The mournful lamentation of the Psalmist then plainly received its fulfilment, "O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance. Thy holy temple have they defiled, and made Jerusalem an heap of stones," (Ps. lxxix. 1.) and, indeed, the whole remaining portion of that psalm. It is said that in one place they slew a multitude of children together, and having collected their blood into a brook which they had previously dammed back, they drank the mixture, of which the greater part was pure blood. It is said, also, that in the church they shattered the crucifixes with every mark of dishonour, in contempt of Christ and to their own infamy; they dug up the altars, and near them, yea, upon them, they slaughtered the clergy and the innocent children. Wherefore we may again not unfitly exclaim in lamentation with the Prophet, "O God, Thou hast cast us out, and scattered us abroad; Thou hast also been displeased, and hast not turned unto us again," (Ps. lx.) and so on as there follows. That infamous army received accessions from the Normans, Germans, and English, from the Northumbrians and Cumbrians, from Teviotdale and Lothian, from the Picts, commonly called Galwegians, and the Scots, and no one knew their number; for multitudes uncalled-for allied themselves with those above mentioned, either from love of plunder, or opportunity of revenge, or the mere desire of mischief with which that region was rife. Overrunning the province, and sparing none, they ravaged with sword and fire almost all Northumberland as far as the river Tyne, excepting the towns and the sea-coast which lies on the eastern side, but this they designed to devastate on their return. A portion of that army also crossed the Tyne, and massacred numberless persons in the wilds, laying waste in the same way the greater part of the territory of St. Cuthbert on the west side.

While these things were being perpetrated by his followers, the king of Scotland with a considerable force occupied Corbridge. At this period a monastery¹ of the Cistercian rule, founded the same year on the property of Ralph de Merley, was destroyed, and very many others were overwhelmed with the heaviest afflictions. Wherefore the monastery at the mouth of the river Tyne, called in English Tynemouth, in order to secure itself and its inmates in this urgent need, paid to the king of Scotland and his men twenty-seven marks of silver. In this raging and tempestuous period, that noble monastery of Hexham, (although in the very midst of the collision, and placed as it were on the very route of these ruffians, so as to be surrounded by them on every side,) yet on account of the renowned merits of its tutelary saints, Andrew the apostle, and Wilfrid, bishop and martyr, and of its other patrons, Saints Acca, Almund, and Eata, bishops and confessors, and the other saints who reposed within that church,—offered the most tranquil security to its people and those who took refuge in it, and afforded them all a perfectly safe asylum from hostile assaults. Nevertheless, at first the Picts rushed with impetuous haste to the river Tyne, on which the town stands, and would have destroyed it, as they had others; but just as they were about to cross this river, two of their number were killed by their own countrymen, and on this the others retired in fear. Moreover, two of the same tribe of Picts came by chance upon an oratory of St. Michael the archangel, situated on that, the northern bank of the river Tyne, and attached to the aforesaid church of Hexham; thereupon they broke open the door, and carried off what they found. But the vengeance of God overtook them; for, given up to the evil one, they were bereft of reason, and, as the madness drove them, tore night and day, in the sight of all, through forest and country, and both perished by a horrible death; the one first battering his own face with stones, and then having his legs cut off by some one, the other drowning himself in the Tyne. These events striking terror into some of the army, they did not venture to make any further attempt upon the possessions of the church of Hexham. Thereupon David, king of Scotland, and earl Henry his son, guaranteed to that monastery, its brethren, and all belonging to it, continued security from hostilities on the part of themselves and all their followers; and this they confirmed by their charters, which are preserved in that church, the sole condition being that they, on their part, should preserve the peace towards him and his. Thus that noble church, founded by St. Wilfrid, preserving its ancient and wonted lustre in this and other storms of battle and contention, became a secure place of refuge to numberless poor as well as rich, to whom it afforded the necessaries of life, and the preservation of their property.

Meanwhile, about the feast of the Purification of St. Mary [2d Feb.], Stephen, king of England, arrived with a great number of earls and barons, and a large force of horse and foot. On hearing of this the king of Scotland left Northumberland, and rapidly retreated with his army to his own territory. He marched to Wark, and afterwards lay in wait with his troops in some wilds near Roxburgh, with a design to ensnare the king of England, who he hoped would take up his quarters at Roxburgh. He directed the citizens to receive him favourably, and to make a show of good faith; but he also directed that when he with his army should steal up by night, and a number of soldiers whom he had placed in the town should make a sudden sally and join him with the townsmen, they all should unite in encompassing the king of England unawares on every side, and should cut him off with all his men. But the Lord, who knoweth the thoughts of man that they are but vain, brought to nought all these devices. For the king of England crossed the river Tweed, and did not proceed to Roxburgh, but devastated and burnt a great portion of the territory of the king of Scotland ; and then, because many of his knights declined to take arms and carry on the war, (for it was now the beginning of Lent,)¹ and also because the king of Scotland and his men dared not give battle, and moreover, his own army was deficient in supplies, he therefore retired with his troops to the south of England. But, on the Friday of the week following the celebration of Easter [15th April], the king of Scotland, so frequently mentioned, with his execrable army, once more returned to Northumberland, and with no less ferocity and cruelty than he had previously exhibited, he devastated first the sea-coast of the county, which on the former occasion had been left undisturbed, and all those other portions besides which anywhere had escaped uninjured, and after that the greater part of the territory of St. Cuthbert, on the eastern side, between Durham and the sea. And both on this and the former occasion he in like manner destroyed, together with the husbandmen, many farms of the monks who served God and St. Cuthbert day and night. But St. Cuthbert at length took pity on his servants ; for, whilst his adherents were perpetrating these enormities, the king with his retinue took up his abode near Durham, and there a serious mutiny having arisen on account of a certain woman, the life of the king and his suite was placed in jeopardy by the Picts. Whilst under much apprehension from this danger, suddenly a false report was spread that a large army was approaching from the south of Britain ; so he with all his forces, leaving untouched their provisions already prepared, fled unpursued towards their own country, and marching to Norham, which is in the territory of St. Cuthbert, and laying siege to it, endeavoured to assault and reduce it by various plans and devices. And while he remained there occupied in the siege, he despatched his nephew William, son of Duncan, on an expedition into Yorkshire, with the Picts and a portion of his army. When they had arrived there, and had gained the victory, on account of the sins of the people, they destroyed by fire and sword the main part of the possessions of a splendid monastery situated in Southernness, and in the district called Craven. Then, sparing no rank, no age, no sex, no condition, they first massacred, in the most barbarous manner possible, children and kindred in the sight of their relatives, masters in sight of their servants, and servants in the sight of their masters, and husbands before the eyes of their wives ; and then (horrible to relate) they carried off, like so much booty, the noble matrons and chaste virgins, together with other women. These naked, fettered, herded together, by whips and thongs they drove before them, goading them with their spears and other weapons. This took place in other wars, but in this to a far greater extent. Afterwards, when they were distributed along with the other booty, a few from motives of pity restored some of them to liberty, at the church of St. Mary in Carlisle ; but the Picts and many others carried off those who fell to their share, to their own country. And finally, these brutal men, making no account of adultery, incest, or such crimes, when tired of abusing these poor wretches like unto animals, made them their slaves, or sold them for cattle to other barbarians.

The king of Scots and his men received these tidings with great exultation, and applied themselves to the capture of the fortress before-named with still greater energy. The townsmen at first defended themselves with great vigour, but afterwards being few, and many of them wounded, (there being only nine knights,) despairing also of aid from their lord Geoffrey, bishop of Durham, and being besides inexperienced in such struggles, they in dismay surrendered to the king, while as yet the wall was in good condition, the tower very strong, and their provisions abundant. The soldiers, consequently, and those who were in the town, incurred great obloquy, because they had made a feeble resistance, and had too readily given up the castle; and not only were they censured, but their lord also, because he had not garrisoned his fortress according to his means, and as the necessities of the period required. The knights retired with their men to Durham. So the king, having captured the town, and taken the provisions which were there stored up in much abundance, intimated to the bishop that if he would desert Stephen, king of England, and swear fealty to his party, he would restore the castle to him, and make good the damage which it had sustained. This the bishop refused, and the king, therefore, caused the town to be dismantled.

While these events occurred there, about Rogation¹ time, the soldiers sallying from the town of Wark, seized under their walls king David's supplies, which had to pass close by them, together with the waggons and the attendants. The king, excessively enraged at this, hastened with his whole force to besiege them, and by batteries and all the means in his power he again proceeded to assail it. But by God's blessing all his endeavours fell fruitless. Many of his men were wounded and disabled, and some slain; likewise, in the conflicts which before this siege had been fought with the king's son Henry, some were killed, others wounded or taken prisoners, and ransom received for them. Blessed be God over all, who protecteth the righteous, but overthroweth the wicked! The king then, perceiving that his attempts upon the town were useless, caused the crops to be consumed on the ground, and then levying from his own country, and whencesoever else he could, a larger force than ever before, he united his troops into one body. Moreover Eustace Fitz-John, one of the barons of the king of England, who held a very strong fortress in Northumberland, called Alnwick, and had long secretly favoured the king of Scotland, now openly showing his treachery, threw off his allegiance to his lawful sovereign, the king of England, and with his whole strength gave his aid to the Scots against the realm of England. Leading with him no inconsiderable number of fighting men, he marched with the king of Scotland to ravage Yorkshire, and had made arrangements to give up to the king of Scotland and his party another strong castle of his called Malton, situated in that province on the river Derwent, not far from York, of which we shall have to say more hereafter. King David then, consigning the siege of Wark to two of the thanes (that is to say, his barons), with their retainers, marched with most of his army to the town called Bamborough, where having taken an outwork of the castle, he killed nearly a hundred men. And then having destroyed the crops around that place, and around William Bertram's town of Mitford, and in many other parts of Northumberland, he crossed the river Tyne. Entering the territory of St. Cuthbert, he there waited for a portion of his army which had not yet joined him, and at his summons the Picts, and Cumbrians, and the men of Carlisle and the adjoining district, came to him without delay. The whole army being thus assembled, he regarded it with unbounded exultation; for it appeared to him immense and invincible, and in truth it was very large, consisting of more than twenty-six thousand men. His heart and the hearts of his men were lifted up, and putting their trust in themselves and their numbers, and having no fear of God, they spoke boastfully and proudly. They both designed and threatened to give to destruction not only Yorkshire, but the greatest part of England; for, with such a host, they did not imagine that any one would venture or be able to resist them. These transactions occurred within the octave of the Nativity of St. Mary [8—15th Sept.]; and the king then passing by Durham, destroyed the crops as far as the river Tees, and, according to his usual practice, caused the towns and churches which had previously escaped uninjured to be dismantled, plundered, and burnt. Crossing the Tees, he commenced a similar career of violence. But God's mercy, being moved by the tears of innumerable widows, orphans, and victims, no longer permitted such wickedness to remain unchastised. For whilst he and his men were engaged in this course of outrage, information of his crimes, his proceedings, and his designs was conveyed to the men of Yorkshire, both by common report and by sure intelligence; whereupon the barons of that province, to wit, archbishop Turstin (who, as will presently appear, greatly exerted himself in this emergency), William de Albemarle, Walter de Gant, Robert de Bruce, Roger de Mowbray, Walter Espec, Ilbert de Lacy, William de Percy, Richard de Courcy, William Fossard, Robert de Stuteville, and other powerful and sagacious men, assembled at York, and anxiously deliberated as to what course should be pursued at this crisis. Much irresolution was caused by distrust of each other, arising from suspicions of treachery, by the absence of a chief and leader of the war (for their sovereign, king Stephen, encompassed by equal difficulties in the south of England, was just then unable to join them), and by their dread of encountering, with an inadequate force, so great a host; so that it appeared as if they would actually have abandoned the defence of themselves and their country, had not their archbishop, Turstin, a man of great firmness and worth, animated them by his counsel and exhortations. For, being the shepherd of their souls, he would not, like a hireling on the approach of the wolf, seek safety in flight, but rather, pierced with the deepest emotions of pity at the dispersion and ruin of his flock, he applied all his energy and labours to counteract these great evils. Wherefore, by the authority of his divine commission, and the royal warrant with which on that occasion he was provided, he boldly urged them, by their loyalty and their honour, not to allow themselves through cowardice to be prostrated at one blow by utter savages; but that rather they all, with their dependants, should seek God's favour by true repentance, and turning with all their heart to Him whose wrath these many and heavy evils proved that they deserved, they should then act with the confidence and courage demanded in so pressing an emergency. If they acted thus devotedly, trusting in God's mercy, he assured them of victory; for that infamous people were directing their hostile endeavours against God and holy church rather than against them, and therefore were fighting in a cause unrighteous, nay rather accursed. But their cause was a just and most holy one, inasmuch as they were encountering peril in defence of holy church and of their country; and if so be it should please God that this contest should not terminate without the loss of some of them, yet, by those who were fighting with such an object, death was not to be feared, but rather desired. He promised them also, that the priests of his diocese, bearing crosses, should march with them to battle with their parishioners, and that he also, God willing, designed to be present with his men in the engagement.

At this period of perplexity one of the nobles of that province, Bernard de Baliol, sent to them by the king of England, arrived with a number of knights; and, on the king's part and his own, he greatly aroused their energy to the same effect. Thus incited by the charge of the king and their archbishop, coming unanimously to one decision, they returned to their own abodes; and shortly after again met at York, each fully equipped and armed for battle. Having there made private confession, the archbishop enjoined on them and the whole populace a three days' fast with almsgiving; after which he solemnly absolved them, and gave them God's blessing and his own. And although he was himself so greatly reduced by age and infirmity, that he had to be carried on a litter where need was, yet, in order to animate their courage, he would readily have accompanied them to the field of battle. But they compelled him to stay behind, begging that he would employ himself in interceding for them by prayers and alms, by vigils and fasts, and other sacred observances; while they (as God would deign to aid them, and as their position demanded) would cheerfully go forth against the enemy, in defence of God's church, and of him who was his minister. So he consigned to them his cross, and the standard of St. Peter, and his retainers; and they proceeded to the town called Thirsk, from whence they despatched Robert de Bruce and Bernard de Baliol to the king of Scotland, who was then, as has been said, devastating the territory of St. Cuthbert. They very humbly and courteously besought him that he would at least desist from his acts of ferocity; and faithfully promised him that if he would accede to their request, they would obtain from the king of England the earldom of Northumberland, which he claimed for his son Henry. But he, together with his followers, with a hardened heart, spurned their solicitation, and disdainfully taunted them. They therefore returned to their associates, Robert abjuring the homage he had rendered him, and Bernard the fealty which he had sworn to him on one occasion when he had been taken prisoner by him. All the nobles, therefore, of that province, and William Peverel and Geoffrey Halsalin from Nottinghamshire, and Robert de Ferrers from Derbyshire, and other eminent and sagacious men, made a compact amongst themselves, which they confirmed by oaths, that not one of them, in this difficulty, would desert another while he had the power to aid him; and thus all would either perish or conquer together. At the same time the archbishop sent to them Ralph, surnamed Novellus, bishop of Orkney, with one of his archdeacons and other clergy, who, as his delegate, should impose penance and give absolution to the people who daily flocked to them from every quarter. He also sent to them, as he had promised, the priests with their parishioners. While thus waiting the approach of the Scots, the scouts whom they had sent forward to reconnoitre returned, bringing the information that the king with his army had already passed the river Tees, and was ravaging their province in his wonted manner. They therefore hastened to resist them; and passing the village of Alverton [North Allerton], they arrived early in the morning at a plain distant from it about two miles. Some of them soon erected, in the centre of a frame which they brought, the mast of a ship, to which they gave the name of the Standard; whence those lines of Hugh Sotevagina,¹ archdeacon of York:—

“ Our gallant stand by all confest,
 Be this the Standard's fight;
 Where death or victory the test,
 That proved the warriors' might.”

On the top of this pole they hung a silver pix containing the Host, and the banner of St. Peter the Apostle, and John of Beverley and Wilfrid of Ripon, confessors and bishops. In doing this, their hope was that our Lord Jesus Christ, by the efficacy of his Body, might be their leader in the contest in which they were engaging in defence of his church and their country. By this means they also provided for their men, that, in the event of their being cut off and separated from them, they might observe some certain and conspicuous rallying-point, by which they might rejoin their comrades, and where they would receive succour.

Scarcely, then, had they put themselves in battle array, when tidings were brought that the king of Scotland was close at hand with his whole force, ready and eager for the contest. The greater part of the knights, then dismounting, became foot soldiers, a chosen body of whom, interspersed with archers, were arranged in the front rank. The others, with the exception of those who were to dispose and rally the forces, mustered with the barons in the centre, near and around the standard, and were enclosed by the rest of the host, who closed in on all sides. The troop of cavalry and the horses of the knights were stationed at a little distance, lest they should take fright at the shouting and uproar of the Scots. In like manner, on the enemy's side, the king and almost all his followers were on foot, their horses being kept at a distance. In front of the battle were the Picts; in the centre, the king with his knights and English;¹ the rest of the barbarian host poured roaring around them.

As they advanced in this order to battle, the standard with its banners became visible at no great distance; and at once the hearts of the king and his followers were overpowered by extreme terror and consternation; yet, persisting in their wickedness, they pressed on to accomplish their bad ends. On the octaves of the Assumption of St. Mary, being Monday, the eleventh of the kalends of September [22d Aug.], between the first and third hours, the struggle of this battle was begun and finished. For numberless Picts being slain immediately on the first attack, the rest, throwing down their arms, disgracefully fled. The plain was strewn with corpses; very many were taken prisoners; the king and all the others took to flight; and at length, of that immense army all were either slain, captured, or scattered as sheep without a shepherd. They fled like persons bereft of reason, in a marvellous manner, into the adjoining district of their adversaries, increasing their distance from their own country, instead of retreating towards it. But wherever they were discovered, they were put to death like sheep for the slaughter; and thus, by the righteous judgment of God, those who had cruelly massacred multitudes, and left them unburied, and giving them neither their country's nor a foreign rite of burial,—left a prey to the dogs, the birds, and the wild beasts,—were either dismembered and torn to pieces, or decayed and putrefied in the open air. The king also, who, in the haughtiness of his mind and the power of his army, seemed a little before to reach with his head even to the stars of heaven, and threatened ruin to the whole or greatest part of England, now dishonoured and meanly attended, barely escaped with his life, in the utmost ignominy and dismay. The power of Divine vengeance was also most plainly exhibited in this, that the army of the vanquished was incalculably greater than that of the conquerors. No estimate could be formed of the number of the slain; for, as many affirm, of that army which came out of Scotland alone, it was computed by the survivors that more than ten thousand were missing; and in various localities of the Deirans, Bernicians, Northumbrians, and Cumbrians, many more perished after the fight than fell in the battle.

The army of the English having, by God's help, with a small loss, thus easily obtained the victory, and taken possession of the spoil, which was found in great abundance, was very speedily disbanded; and all returning to their homes, they restored with joy and thanksgiving to the churches of the saints the banners which they had received. They had gone forth to this battle in their gayest array, and with costly splendour, as to a royal marriage. Some of the barons, with a portion of the army, marched to Eustace's town, called Malton, mentioned above; and having destroyed the suburb, they laid siege to it, because, during the fight, the soldiers had sallied from it by orders of their lord, and set fire to many villages. A truce of eight days was arranged, after which the siege continued. The ground on which the above battle was fought was alone the possession of St. Cuthbert, the whole surrounding district being owned by others; and this occurred not by design of the combatants, but by the dispensation of Providence; for it may clearly be observed that Divine justice would not long allow to go unpunished the iniquity that had been perpetrated in the territory of his holy and beloved confessor and bishop, but would speedily visit it with wonted vengeance.

The king of England received the news of this event with extreme joy; and, being informed that they had greatly distinguished themselves in this affair, he created William de Albemarle earl in Yorkshire, and Robert de Ferrers earl in Derbyshire. And it is to be remarked that, about this time, fortune in a like manner befriended himself and his supporters, both in the south of England and in Normandy, in their encounters with their opponents. The king of Scotland added fresh force to the siege of Wark, upon being rejoined by his son Henry, and reassembling his men, who had fled from the fight separately, rather like bitter foes than comrades; for when these Angles, Scots, Picts, and other barbarians, experience a disaster, those who have the power either murder, wound, or at the least despoil the others, and then, by the righteous judgment of God, they were cut off by their allies as well as their foes. The king, upon hearing these facts, imposed upon his subjects heavy penalties and fines, and drew from them an immense sum of money; at the same time, he bound them more strongly than ever before, by oaths and pledges, never more to abandon him in war. He then endeavoured by engines, new constructions, and various devices, to gain possession of the town of Wark. The townsmen, however, destroyed his engines, killed in various ways several of the king's men, and wounded many, with a loss of only one of their own soldiers, who was cut off and slain by a multitude of the Scots who had sallied from the castle, and he, rashly confident in his own valour, was staying to demolish one of the engines. The king at length, seeing all his endeavours ineffectual, and damaging to himself and his troops, removed his engines relinquished the assault, and enforced a strict blockade of the town, much against the inclination of his followers; for in consequence of the great losses, difficulties, and destitution which they had there endured, they were completely worn out by the protracted siege.

At this time certain lawless persons, whose sole study and delight was to plan and perpetrate crimes, banded themselves together in a detestable alliance, the more effectually to carry out their designs of mischief. The chiefs and leaders of this abominable fraternity were Edgar, the illegitimate son of earl Cospatrick, and Robert and Uctred, sons of Meldred. Urged, therefore, by rapacity, encouraged by impunity, and frenzied by passion, they overran

Northumberland like wolves, seeking whom they might devour; and crossing the river Tyne, they came upon the territory of St. Cuthbert, but lighting upon nothing there which it was within their power or their daring to seize, they returned empty-handed. They then carried off all the booty they could obtain in a village of the parish of Hexham, called Herintun [Errington]. Two nights after these same robbers attacked another village called Digentun [Denton]. This village was the property of the canons of the church aforesaid, and was distant eight miles east of Hexham. Having slain three of the canons' servants, and heaped many insults on their prior, who had happened to arrive unexpectedly that night, they marched off with their spoil. This mischance befel these canons contrary to their expectation, inasmuch as the king of Scotland had promised, as well for himself as for all his followers, (as was before said,) the most absolute security to them, their vassals, their effects, their parish, and expressly this very village.

About this period Alberic, bishop of Ostia, arrived in these parts, having been sent by pope Innocent to fulfil the office of legate in England and Scotland. By birth he was a Frenchman, by profession a monk of the Clugniac order, eminent for learning, sacred and secular, of much experience in ecclesiastical affairs, of remarkable eloquence and sound judgment; and, what is far beyond all this, he gave proof in demeanour and appearance, and in fact in his whole conversation and conduct, of great goodness and piety. Entering Clugny on his first profession, he, by his discretion and piety, attained the office of sub-prior, where, in consequence, the whole charge of the ritual observance came under his supervision. Afterwards, in France, he for some time filled the office of prior in the religious house known as St. Martin des Champs; but inasmuch as he was of great service, and in high esteem amongst his brethren, he was some years after recalled to occupy the position of sub-prior at home. From this he was chosen to preside as abbot over the monastery of Vezeley,¹ and thence, by canonical election, he was elevated to the bishopric of the church of Ostia. To the bishops of this church pertained, by a dignity of long standing, the privilege of consecrating the pope himself. Coming (as we have said) to England, he afforded to all his faithful sons much satisfaction as to the condition of the holy mother church of Rome; for the sovereign pontiff above named sent by him his epistle to all the children of the Catholic church. In it he related how the vessel of St. Peter had toiled on heavily, having been long and violently agitated by opposing billows, and thrown, shaken and shattered, on the rocks of schismatics, and was well-nigh past hope of recovery, since, unhappily, for eight years it had been exposed to havoc and pollution, inexpressible and accursed, which had been inflicted on it by that first-born of Satan, Petrus Leo,² and his supporters. But this there was no need to dwell upon, for it had been known and lamented by almost the whole world. But the infinite mercy of Christ, though it seemed to slumber, and, for our sins, to pay no regard, nevertheless, moved at length and aroused by the earnest prayers and tears of his faithful people, stilled by the mighty word of his power the raging of the sea, the violence of the winds, and the fury of the tempest, changing the storm into a favouring breeze. He brought the church to rest in the haven of peace and the joy of security. Moreover, He turned the arrogance and glorying of all her enemies to prostration and ignominy, and brought the necks of all who opposed her under the yoke of her power. We may therefore justly exclaim with the Psalmist, "O Lord our Governor, how excellent is thy name in all the world, Thou that hast set thy glory above the heavens." [Ps. viii. 1.]

Besides the epistle which thus spoke of the recovery of peace and unity to the holy Roman church, and the restoration of the apostolic power and dignity, Alberic brought also letters warranting his mission, addressed by the pope aforesaid to the kings of England and Scotland, to Thurstin, archbishop of York, (the metropolitan see of Canterbury being at that time vacant,) and to the bishops, abbots, and prelates of holy church in both kingdoms; he was therefore received by all with respect. He also brought with him from the continent the abbot¹ of the monastery of Molesme, with several monks; and immediately on his arrival in England he summoned to his side one other, named Richard, abbot of the monastery called Fountains, a very religious man of great influence: these truly wise and virtuous men were the constant companions and witnesses of his life and course of action. In order that he might avail himself of their advice and assistance in the transaction of affairs, and that by their testimony the uprightness of his conduct might be fully evidenced, he made the circuit of nearly the whole of England, visiting the cathedral churches and the monasteries of both clerics and monks, at each of which he was received with due reverence. He at length reached Durham, where at this time William Cumin, chancellor of David, king of Scotland, was kept in confinement, having been taken prisoner in his flight from the battle above mentioned. He delivered him at once from his imprisonment, and restored him in freedom to his sovereign. Then, accompanied by two bishops, Robert of Hereford and Athelwulf of Carlisle, three abbots, and several clergy, he came over the moors to the monastery of Hexham, at which place he was entertained by the brethren with all fitting honour; and with much consideration, he cheered them under the injury which they had recently sustained by the loss of their men and the pillaging of their territory, as we have just narrated. Passing thence through Northumberland and Cumberland, he arrived at Carlisle four days before the feast of St. Michael [29th Sept.], and there met the king of Scotland, with the bishops, abbots, priors, and barons of his country. They, differing widely from the Cisalpine—and indeed from almost the whole church—appear to have inclined in a great degree to the schism of Peter Leo of execrable memory ; but now, through the influence of Divine grace, they one and all received with great veneration the missive of pope Innocent and his legate. For three days, then, he was busily employed with them on the affairs of his mission. He was informed that John, bishop of Glasgow, committing to no one the cure of souls which he held, had clandestinely, without leave, resigned his bishopric, and, for no apparent reason, had become a monk at Tiron ; whereupon he determined in his case that a king's messenger, with letters from himself and the king, should be sent for him, and in the event of his refusal to return home, that sentence should be pronounced against him ; and this was done accordingly. He also negotiated with the king concerning the renewal of a peace between him and the king of England, and on this behalf entreated him to take pity on holy church, and on himself and his people, on whom he had brought so many and great evils ; but he with difficulty obtained a suspension of hostilities, to the extent that, excepting the investment of Wark, he would send no force, and make no aggression upon the territory of the king of England before the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.]. He also obtained this from the Picts, that before the same period they would bring to Carlisle all the girls and women whom they held captive, and there restore them to liberty. They also, and all the others, promised him most faithfully that they would not again in any way violate churches, and that they would spare children and females, and persons enfeebled by age and infirmity, and, in short, would slay none but those engaged in actual conflict. Moreover, the king, unsolicited, discoursed with the prior of Hexham, who had come with the legate, concerning the loss sustained by himself and his brethren, which he much lamented, and for which he promised full indemnification, and also that he would compel his people to make amends for the injury done to them and their church, and for the slaughter of their men. And this he in a great measure fulfilled ; for nearly all their property, and that of their vassals, was restored.

These affairs being thus arranged, the legate taking his departure on the feast of St. Michael [29th Sept.], returned by way of Hexham and Durham to the south of England, and related to Stephen, king of England, what he had accomplished with David, king of Scotland, and his people. The king of Scotland, a few days after, learnt from some who had come out of Wark, that those in the town were reduced to great extremity by famine ; and, in consequence, he enforced a still more strict blockade. This indeed was the case, for the garrison, from want of provisions, had killed and salted their horses, and had already consumed the greater part of them, but were, nevertheless, unwilling to surrender the town, and indeed designed, when food altogether failed them, to sally armed from the fortress, charge through the enemy, and defend themselves to the last, unless in the meanwhile God should provide for them some other resource. About the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.], William, abbot of Rievaulx, came into that province, and, on the part of Walter Espce, to whom, as before said, the town belonged, charged them to yield it to the king of Scotland, for he was well aware how wofully they were reduced by famine. The king thereupon, by the mediation of the abbot, gave them twenty-five horses, and allowed them to march out with their arms; and being put in possession of the town, he speedily caused it to be dismantled. The above-named legate, on his return, as before mentioned, from his visitation of the sees and monasteries to the court of the king of England, met there another legate, who had just arrived from the sovereign pope Innocent. They consequently issued a summons to Thurstin, archbishop of York, and all the bishops, abbots, and priors of canons throughout England, to assemble at a general council in the city of London, on the feast of St. Nicholas [6th Dec.]. They met at the appointed time and place with Stephen, king of England, and both legates entered with them upon the discussion of the affairs of the church; Alberic, however, took precedence. The council was to the following effect:—

“ In the year of our Lord 1138, the ninth year of the pontificate of the sovereign pope Innocent the second, the third year of the reign of the most pious and illustrious Stephen, king of the English, nephew of the great king Henry, the synod of London was held in the church of St. Peter, the chief of the apostles, at Westminster, in the month of December, on the thirteenth day of the month, at which, after the discussion of many questions, these canons, seventeen in number, were issued and unanimously confirmed. Alberic, bishop of Ostia, and legate in England and Scotland of the aforesaid pope Innocent, presided over this synod, where there were assembled eighteen bishops of various provinces, about thirty abbots, and a countless multitude of clergy and laity. The see of Canterbury was at that time vacant, and Thurstin, archbishop of York, was out of health, but he sent thither William, dean of the church of St. Peter at York, with some of his clergy. The following are the canons:—

“ Following the canonical institutes of the holy fathers, we, by apostolic authority, prohibit the exaction of any fee whatever for chrisms, for oil, for baptism, for absolution, for the visitation of the sick, for the betrothal of women, for unction, for the communion of Christ’s Body, or for burial. Whoever shall dare to do so, let him be excommunicate.

“ We enact, also, that the Body of Christ be not received beyond eight days, and be not carried to the sick except by the priest or deacons, or, in extreme necessity, by some other, and this with the greatest reverence.

“ Likewise we enact, by apostolic authority, that at the consecration of bishops, and the benediction of abbots, neither a hood, nor ecclesiastical vestment, nor anything be demanded from the bishop or his ministers; and also, in the consecration of churches, no demand shall be made for tapestry, towel, or basin, or anything beyond the fee allowed by the sacred canons.

“ When any bishop shall procure the consecration of a church in his diocese by another bishop, we, by apostolic authority, prohibit any demand being made beyond that bishop’s fee.

“ ‘ No one shall receive from lay hands a church, or any ecclesiastical benefice whatever. When any one receives investiture from the bishop, we direct that he shall take oath upon the Gospels that he has not on this account given or promised anything to any one by himself or another ; and where this has been done, the presentation shall be void, and both giver and acceptor shall be subject to canonical judgment.

“ ‘ We further enact, that no one shall claim by inheritance any church or other ecclesiastical benefice held by his father ; and no one shall appoint a successor to himself in any ecclesiastical benefice ; and where this is done we decree it to be void, saying, with the Psalmist, “ O my God, make them like unto a wheel who have said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession,” [Ps. lxxxiii. 13.]

“ ‘ Clergy ordained by other than their own bishops, without letters dimissory, we suspend from the functions of the orders which they have received, and their plenary restitution shall rest with the Roman pontiff alone, unless they assume the religious habit.

“ ‘ Walking in the steps of the holy fathers, we deprive of ecclesiastical functions and benefices all priests, deacons, and subdeacons, married or living in concubinage, and, by apostolic authority, we forbid all persons from hearing a mass celebrated by such.

“ ‘ We decree the removal from every ecclesiastical function and benefice of those clergy who practise usury, or follow filthy lucre, or engage in secular business.

“ ‘ If any one shall kill, imprison, or assault any cleric, monk, nun, or any ecclesiastical person whatever, unless at the third summons he make satisfaction, he shall be excommunicate. Nor shall any one except the Roman pontiff give him absolution, unless at the point of death ; and if he die impenitent, his body shall not receive sepulture.

“ ‘ Whosoever shall seize by violence the property of churches, whether moveable or fixed, we pronounce him excommunicate, unless after canonical citation he make amends.

“ ‘ We, by apostolic authority, prohibit any one from founding on his estate a church or oratory without licence from the bishop.

“ ‘ To these we subjoin the judgment of pope Nicholas, who says, “ Inasmuch as the soldiers of Christ differ from the soldiers of the world, it is not meet that the soldier of the church should engage in secular warfare, of which the shedding of blood must be the result. In short, as it is disgraceful that a laic perform mass, or administer the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, so it is absurd and improper for a cleric to bear arms or engage in war ; as the apostle Paul says, ‘ No man that warreth for God entangleth himself,’ &c. (2 Tim. ii. 4.)”

“ ‘ We likewise approve the judgment of pope Innocent, communicated to Victricus, archbishop of Rouen, that monks who after residing in monasteries are advanced to the priesthood, should not in any degree deviate from their former rule ; in the clerical rank they ought to live as when they resided in their monasteries, and not to abandon in a higher position the order which they have long observed.

“By apostolic authority, we forbid nuns to use skins of vair or gris, sable, marten, ermine, or beaver, to wear gold rings, or to practise curling or braiding of the hair: whosoever shall be detected in the violation of this law shall be excommunicated.

“By apostolic authority, we decree due tithes of all first-fruits to be paid: any one who shall refuse payment of these tithes shall incur sentence of excommunication.

“We further enact, that schoolmasters who shall let for hire the teaching of their schools to others, shall be liable to ecclesiastical censure.’”

The election of an archbishop to the see of Canterbury (which, as has been said, was then vacant) was agitated at this council, and this matter was brought to a conclusion after the following Epiphany, when the abbot of the monastery of Bec, Theobald by name, was consecrated¹ by the aforesaid Alberic, archbishop of that church. At the same council the abbot of Croyland was deposed, and another substituted in his room, namely, Godfrey, prior of the church of St. Alban the Martyr; and Adam was elected abbot of the abbey near Hastings, called Battle: upon both of these the aforesaid Alberic bestowed the benediction. He also invited all the bishops and many of the abbots of England to a general council, which the sovereign pope Innocent was about to hold at Rome in the middle of Lent. During the course of these proceedings, he was engaged most discreetly and earnestly in treating with several persons, and especially with the queen of England, respecting the renewal of peace between the two kings. Finding that the queen's mind was much set upon the accomplishment of this object, with her mediation, and backed by her feminine shrewdness and address, he frequently appealed to the king himself regarding this matter. They found him at first stern, and apparently opposed to a reconciliation; for many of his barons who had suffered severe losses from their variance, eagerly urged him on no account to make peace with the king of Scotland, but boldly to avenge himself upon him; but notwithstanding all this, the zeal of a woman's heart, ignoring defeat, persisted night and day in every species of importunity, till it succeeded in bending the king's mind to its purpose. For she was warmly attached to her uncle David, king of Scotland, and his son Henry, her cousin, and on that account took the greatest pains to reconcile them to her husband. The legate, seeing the affair progressing in this way, derived fresh confidence in his intercourse with the king, from the better hope which had sprung up, and gave his attention to his other concerns.

A.D. 1139. The legate, so frequently mentioned, having completed his business in England, repaired to the coasts with his associates soon after the octave of the Epiphany [Jan. 13], and crossed the sea on his return; for he hastened to attend at the appointed time the council of the sovereign pope before mentioned. To represent the bishops and abbots of England, there went to the same council these five bishops, Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, Ernulf, bishop of Rochester, Simon of Worcester, Roger of Coventry, and Robert of Exeter, and with them four abbots; for king Stephen would not send any more on account of the troubles of his kingdom, which were then very great. Moreover Thurstin, of happy memory, archbishop of York, sent thither Richard, abbot of Fountains, a highly excellent man, of whom we have spoken before, both on account of the council and of some other private business which he had commissioned him to transact; for it was generally asserted that he designed to relinquish his see, and to appoint in his stead, as archbishop of York, his own brother Audoenus, bishop of Evreux. But while this was in preparation, his envoy died at Rome, leaving the matter unaccomplished, and also his brother, who before his death had assumed the religious habit of the monks at Merton, departed¹ this life at that place. The archbishop of Canterbury, with his pall, the aforesaid bishops and abbots, when the council was over, and their business completed, returned safe and sound. Soon after the aforesaid legate had left England, peace was concluded between the two kings, by means of envoys, on these terms: Stephen, king of England, granted to Henry, son of David, king of Scotland, the earldom of Northumberland, except two towns, Newcastle and Bamburgh, with all the lands which he held before. But for these towns he was bound to give him towns of the same value in the south of England. He directed also that the barons who held of the earldom, as many as chose, might make acknowledgment for their lands to earl Henry, and do homage to him, saving the fealty which they had vowed to himself; and this the most of them did. The king of Scotland and his son Henry, with all their dependants, were bound thenceforward to remain for life amicable and faithful to Stephen, king of England. And to render their fidelity more secure, they were pledged to give him as hostages five earls of Scotland, the son of earl Cospatrick, the son of Hugh de Morville, the son of earl Fergus, the son of Mel . . . , and the son of Mac They were bound also to observe unalterably the laws, customs, and statutes which his uncle king Henry had established in the county of Northumberland. This agreement was signed at Durham on the fifth of the ides of April [April 9], by Henry, son of the king of Scotland, and their barons, in the presence of Matilda, queen of England, and many earls and barons of the south of England. This also was specially defined, that earl Henry could claim no right either over the territory of St. Cuthbert, or over that of St. Andrew in Hexham-shire, inasmuch as it appertained to the archbishop of York. Going with the queen to the court of king Stephen, he found him at Nottingham. What had been done at Durham being confirmed by him, he remained during the summer in southern England, frequenting the king's court, and incurring great expense in his service. In this year died Walter de Gant, who had assumed the monkish habit at Bardney; and Robert de Ferrers, who was earl of Derbyshire.

CHRONICLE OF HOLYROOD.

CHRONICLE OF HOLYROOD.

IN the year seven hundred and fifty-two from the foundation of Rome, Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judæa, in the forty-second year of the emperor Octovianus Augustus. In the one hundred and ninety-third year of the Olympiad, peace was proclaimed to the world upon the advent of Him who is the true peace. At this time in Rome, on the further side of the Tiber at the Taberna Meritoria, a fountain of oil welled out of the ground, and flowed with an abundant stream during the entire day; thereby intimating the grace of Christ to the Gentiles. At that time also, a circle, resembling the rainbow, appeared round the sun. Octovianus, the emperor, reigned for fifty-six years.

A. D. 30. But in the fifteenth of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, our Lord Jesus Christ commenced his ministry; and in the eighteenth year of the reign of the same emperor, Jesus Christ the Son of God, having offered Himself for us, was crucified. Tiberius reigned twenty-three years.

A. D. 538. There was an eclipse of the sun upon the fourteenth of the kalends of January [19th Dec.], from the first until the third hour.

A. D. 540. The sun was once more eclipsed, on the twelfth of the kalends of July [20th June], and for half-an-hour the stars were visible; from the third hour of the day until nearly the sixth.

A. D. 547. Ida began his reign, from whom the royal race of the Northumbrians deduces its origin, and he continued to reign for twelve years.

A. D. 565. Father Columba came from Ireland into Britain to instruct the Picts, and erected a monastery in the island of Iona.

A. D. 596. Pope Gregory, acting under God's directions, sent Augustine the servant of God, and many other God-fearing monks with him, to preach the word of God to the English nation. This occurred in the fourteenth year of the said prince, and about a hundred and fifty years after the arrival of the Angles in Britain.

A. D. 597. These teachers arrived in England in this the hundred and fiftieth year after the arrival of the Angles in Britain.

A. D. 601. Pope Gregory sent the pall into Britain for Augustine, who had now been made a bishop, and at the same time he despatched hither many ministers of the Word, the chief and most important of whom are Mellitus, Justus, Paulinus, and Rufinianus.

A. D. 603. Edan, king of the Scots who inhabit Britain, marched against Aelfred, king of the Northumbrians, with an immense and powerful army; but he was defeated, and escaped with only a few of his men. Nearly all his army was cut to pieces in that most celebrated place called Dexastan, that is, The stone of Dexa. Aelfrid fought this battle in the eleventh year of his reign; that is, in the first year of Phocas, who at this time held the sceptre of the Roman empire. This same king Aelfrid reigned twenty-four years.

A. D. 604. The Eastern Saxons received the Christian faith through bishop Mellitus, while their king was Sigebert. St. Augustine ordained two bishops, namely, Mellitus, and Justus; the former, Melitus, to preach in the province of the East Saxons, of which the metropolis is London; the latter, Justus, he ordained to that city in Kent which is called Rochester. At this time died Augustine, that father beloved of God, upon the seventh of the kalends of June [26th May], during the reign of king Ethelbert. Laurence succeeded Augustine in the bishopric, whom, during his own lifetime, he had ordained for this purpose, to guard against the danger which might affect this infant church, were it deprived of a pastor for even one single hour.

A. D. 605. The blessed pope Gregory died, after having most gloriously ruled over the Roman see of the apostolic church, and was translated to an eternal residence in the kingdom of heaven. He governed the church during the time of the emperors Maurice and Phocas; and in the second year of the reign of this Phocas he departed from this life.

A. D. 616, (being the twenty-first year since Augustine and his companions had been despatched to preach the gospel to the nation of the Angles,) Ethelbert, king of Kent, attained the joys of the kingdom of heaven, after having ruled over an earthly kingdom for fifty-three years, with the greatest reputation. He was the third of these kings of the nation of the Angles who governed all the provinces which are situated on the south of the Humber, by which river they and the adjacent districts are separated from the northern; but he was the first of them who ascended into the kingdom of heaven. The first whose sway was so extensive was Aelle, king of the Saxons upon the Humber; the second was Coelin, king of the West Saxons, who in their dialect is called Ceaulin; the third (as we have already stated) was Aethelbert, the king of Kent; the fourth was Redwald, the king of the East Angles, who, even during the time of Aethelbert, consented that he should exercise authority over his people. The fifth was Eadwin, the king of the nation of the Northumbrians, that is, of that people which is situated in the district which lies towards the northern bank of the river Humber: he ruled with greater authority than any of his predecessors had done over the whole population, both of the Angles and the Britons, who inhabit Britain, with the sole exception of the men of Kent. Moreover, he reduced under the power of the Angles, the British islands, called the Mevanian islands, which are situated between Ireland and Britain. The sixth, was the most christian Oswald, also a king of the Northumbrians, whose kingdom was equally extensive. The seventh, was Oswin his brother, who for some time extended his realm in every direction; furthermore, he overcame the greater portion of the nations of the Picts and Scots, who inhabit the northern parts of Britain, and compelled them to pay tribute.

Ethelbert died on the twenty-fourth day of the month of February, after having been a believer for twenty-one years; and was buried in St. Martin's aisle within the church of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, where also queen Berta had previously been interred. This Aethelbert was the son of Irminric, who was the son of Oeric, surnamed Oysc, whose father was Hengist, who had been invited into Britain along with his son Oysc, by Vorgitern. After the death of Aethelbald, his son Edbald assumed the reins of the government.

A. D. 620. The blessed bishop Laurence ascended to the kingdom of heaven, and was buried on the fourth of the nones of February [2d Feb.], in the church of St. Peter the Apostle, near his predecessor Augustine. After him Mellitus, who had been bishop of London, obtained the see of the church of Canterbury; being the third in succession from Augustine. Justus was still alive, and governed the church of Rochester.

A. D. 624. Archbishop Mellitus, after having governed his church for five years, departed to heaven during the reign of Eadbald, and was buried with his fathers in the monastery and church of the most blessed chief of the apostles, which we have so frequently mentioned, upon the eighth of the kalends of May [24th April]. He was immediately succeeded in his bishopric by Justus, who had been bishop of the church of Rochester; to which church he consecrated Romanus as its bishop, having received authority to ordain bishops from pope Boniface.

A. D. 625. Paulinus was ordained bishop of the nation of the Northumbrians by archbishop Justus, on the twelfth of the kalends of August [21st. Jul.].

A. D. 626. Eanfled, the daughter of king Edwin, and twelve others of his household, were baptized upon the Saturday before Pentecost [7th June].

A. D. 627. King Edwin, along with all the nobles of his realm, and a large number of his people, received the faith and the laver of holy regeneration, in the eleventh year of his reign, being about one hundred and eighty years after the arrival of the Angles in Britain. He was baptized at York upon the holy day of Easter, being the day before the ides of April [12th April], in the church of St. Peter the Apostle; and this church he had hurriedly built of wood, in order that he might be catechised and instructed so as to be prepared for baptism. He also gave an episcopal residence within this city to Paulinus, his instructor and bishop.

A. D. 633. Seventeen years after Eadwin had most gloriously ruled the nation of the Angles and the Britons (during six of which he had been the servant of Christ), Cedwalla, the king of the Britons, rebelled against him, having received assistance herein from Penda, a most energetic man, who was of the royal race of the Mercians, who also had himself at that time ruled this said nation for twenty-two years with varied fortunes. A severe battle having been fought between them in the plain called Hatfeld, there Edwin was slain, on the fourth of the ides of October [12th Oct.], being then forty-eight years old, and the whole of his army was either dispersed or killed. In this same battle also fell one of his sons, named Osfrid, a valiant youth; the other, called Eadfrid, was obliged to betake himself to king Penda, by whom he was afterwards put to death, in violation of his oath, during the reign of Oswald. Upon the slaughter of Eadwin, Paulinus returned to Kent.

A. D. 634. Archbishop Justus was removed into the kingdom of heaven, upon the fourth of the ides of November [10th Nov.], and in his stead Honorius was elected to the see. He came for ordination to Paulinus, and by him he was ordained at Lincoln, (where they met,) being the fifth archbishop of the church of Canterbury in succession from Augustine. Pope Honorius sent a pall and letters to him, in which he repeated the orders which he had already embodied in a letter transmitted to king Edwin; namely, that when the archbishop of Canterbury shall die, his survivor in the same rank shall have the power of ordaining another bishop in the room of the deceased, and thus it should not be necessary to undertake the long and wearisome journey to the city of Rome, so far distant by sea and land, for the ordination of an archbishop.

A. D. 640. On his departure from this life, Eadbald, king of Kent, left the reins of government to his son Erconbert, and he held them with the greatest reputation for twenty-four years and some months. He was the first of all the kings of the Angles who, by royal authority, commanded that idols should be abandoned and destroyed throughout all his realm, and also that the fast of the forty days [of Lent] should be observed; and in order that these his injunctions should not be lightly disregarded by any person, he added that fitting and proper punishments should be inflicted upon the transgressors. His daughter Eorcangote, a child worthy of such a parent, was a virgin endowed with many virtues; and she served the Lord in a monastery which had been erected within the realm of the Franks by a most noble abbess called Sara,¹ in a place called In Brigge. For as at that time very few monasteries had been built in the nation of the Angles, many persons were in the habit of going from Britain to those of the Franks, or into Gaul, for the sake of leading a monastic life; and they also sent their daughters thither, that they might receive instruction, and then be joined to Christ their spouse. The greatest number were sent to the monasteries of Brie, Chelles, and Andily.

A. D. 642. Oswald, the most christian king of the Northumbrians, being then in the thirty-fifth year of his age, was killed upon the fifth of August, in a terrible battle in which he had engaged with the heathen nation of the Mercians and their heathen king Penda, by whom his predecessor Edwin had also been slain. This place is called Maserfeld in the language of the Angles. His brother Oswin, a young man of about thirty years old, succeeded him in his earthly throne, and he held it for twenty-eight years; but with the greatest difficulty.

A. D. 644. The most revered father Paulinus passed to the Lord upon the sixth of the ides of October [10th Oct.], being at this time bishop of the city of Rochester, but he had formerly been at York. He held the episcopate for nineteen years, two months, and twenty-one days; and he was buried in the sacristy of the blessed apostle Andrew. To succeed him archbishop Honorius ordained Ytamar, a native of Kent, but equal to any of his predecessors in life and learning.

A. D. 651. King Oswin was slain at a place called Ingetlingum, upon the thirteenth of the kalends of September [20th Aug.], in the ninth year of his reign. Bishop Aidan survived the death of this king, whom he loved so dearly, no longer than twelve days, having been removed from the world on the day before the kalends of September [31st Aug.], that he might receive from the Lord the eternal reward of his labours.

A. D. 653. Having finished his course, archbishop Honorius departed from this life on the day before the kalends of October [30th Sept.]; and after the see had been unoccupied for one year and six months, Deusdedit, of the nation of the West Saxons, was elected the sixth archbishop of the church of Canterbury. He was ordained by Ytamar, bishop of the church of Rochester, who came to Canterbury for the purpose. This took place upon the seventh of the kalends of April [26th March]; and he governed the church for nine years, four months, and two days. Upon his death, Ytamar consecrated in his stead Damian, a South Saxon by birth. The Middle Angles (that is to say, the Angles who inhabit the midland districts), along with their prince Peda, the son of king Penda, received the true faith and sacraments.

A. D. 655. Penda died, and the Mercians became Christians.

A. D. 659. Wulfhere, the son of Penda, succeeded to the kingdom of the Mercians, and he reigned seventeen years.

A. D. 664. There was an eclipse of the sun on the second of May, about the tenth hour of the day. Also, in this year, there broke out a sudden pestilence, which first devastated the southern districts of Britain, and then laid hold upon the province of the Northumbrians, which it ravaged far and wide for a considerable time with great fierceness, and killed a large number of the inhabitants. This plague was equally destructive in the island of Ireland. Deusdedit, the sixth archbishop of Canterbury, died on the day before the ides of July [14th July]; and upon the same month and day died Erchonbert, king of Kent, leaving his royal seat to his son Etbert, which that individual occupied for nineteen years. Colman and his friends returned home, and Cedda and Wilfrid were ordained bishops of the Northumbrians, while the church of Canterbury continued unoccupied for no small time.

A. D. 668. The monk Theodore was ordained bishop of Canterbury by pope Vitalian, upon Sunday, the seventh of the kalends of April [26th March], and he and his companions were despatched upon their mission upon the sixth of the ides of June [8th June].

Theodore was a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, a man well versed in secular and divine literature, skilled in Greek and Latin, of an excellent disposition, and venerable for his age, being sixty-six years old. He reached his church on the second year after his ordination, on Sunday the sixth of the kalends of June [27th May], and he occupied it for twenty-one years, three months, and twenty-six days.

A. D. 670, (being the second year since Theodore's arrival in Britain,) Oswin, king of the Northumbrians, fell ill of the sickness of which he died, being in the fifty-eighth year of his age. At this time so attached was he to the instruction of the Roman and apostolic see, that he had resolved to go to Rome, and to end his days at the holy places, if he had recovered from this sickness; and he had offered no small sum of money to bishop Wilfrid, if he would become his guide upon the journey. He died upon the fifth of the kalends of March [25th Feb.], leaving his son Egfrid as the heir of his kingdom.

A. D. 673. Egbert, king of Kent, died in the month of July, and his brother Lothere succeeded him in the kingdom, which he retained for eleven years and seven months. A synod was held at Hereford on the twenty-fourth of September, in the presence of king Egfrid, and under the presidency of archbishop Theodore.

A. D. 675. Wolfhere, king of the Mercians, died, after having reigned seventeen years; and he left the government to his brother Ethilerd.

A. D. 676. Ethelred, king of the Mercians, at the head of a savage army devastated Kent, and defiled the monasteries, without any regard to the fear of God. In this same year Cuthbert, that servant of the Lord, went to Farne, and continued to be His soldier during eleven years with the most wonderful devotion.

A. D. 678, (the eighth year of the reign of Egfrid,) a star, named a comet, appeared during the month of August; and it continued for three months, becoming visible in the morning, and exhibiting a lofty column of brilliant flame. In this year, also, there arose a disagreement between king Egfrid and the most reverend bishop Wilfrid, in consequence of which the bishop was expelled from his episcopal see, and in his stead Theodore, the archbishop, ordained Bosa, Eatha, and Eaded as bishops.

A. D. 679, (being the ninth year of the reign of Egfrid,) a great battle was fought between Egfrid and Ethelred the king of the Mercians near the river Trent, in which fell Elwin, the brother of king Egfrid, a youth of about eighteen years old, much beloved by both of the provinces. King Eailred had married his sister, who was called Ostridh. When it now appeared that a bitter spirit of hostility had sprung up between those kings and their fierce people, Theodore, that archbishop beloved of God, acting under His instigation, so entirely extinguished the flames which had thus broken out, that he tranquillized the kings and people, and the life of none was required in revenge for the slaughter of the deceased, compensation for whose death was made by the payment only of a large sum of money. The treaty of peace then entered into continued for long between these sovereigns and their realms.

A. D. 680. A synod, concerning the catholic faith, was held in the plain of Hetfeld, under the presidency of archbishop Theodore, in which John, a Roman abbot, was present, upon the fifteenth of the kalends of October [17th Sept.], in the tenth year of Egfrid, king of the Humbrians, in the sixth of Etilred, king of the Mercians, in the seventeenth of Aldulf, king of the East Anglians, and in the seventh of Lothaire, king of the men of Kent. In this year, also, Hilda, the religious handmaid of Christ, the abbess of the monastery which is called Streneshalch, departed from this world, to receive the reward of the life which is in heaven, which she had in many respects anticipated while yet in the flesh. She died on the fifteenth of the kalends of December [17th Nov.], being sixty-six years old,—a period which may be divided into two equal portions, thirty-three of which she spent in the greatest renown, clad in the robes of a laywoman; the remainder she dedicated to the Lord, spending them in the yet more noble conversation of a nun. She was of illustrious descent, being the daughter of Hereric, the nephew of king Edwin.

A. D. 684. Egfrid, king of the Northumbrians, having despatched an army to Ireland, under duke Bercht, miserably destroyed that harmless people, who were always most friendly to the nation of the Angles. The destruction was so complete, that not even the churches or the monasteries were spared.

A. D. 685. As king Egfrid was rashly leading his army to devastate the province of the Picts,—against the earnest persuasion of many of his friends, and especially of Cuthbert of blessed memory, who had lately been ordained bishop,—the enemy pretended that they fled; and the king, being thus tempted to enter into the fastnesses of inaccessible mountains, was slain, along with a large proportion of the troops which he had taken with him, upon the thirteenth of the kalends of June [20th May], being in the fortieth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign. Egfrid was succeeded in his kingdom by Alfrid, a man admirably skilled in the Scriptures, who is said to have been his brother, and the son of king Oswin: he nobly restored the ruined kingdom to its former condition, although compelled to reduce it within narrower limits. In this year also, Lotere, king of Kent, died, after having reigned twelve years, on the eighth of the ides of February [6th Feb.]; he succeeded his brother Egbert, who had reigned nine years. He had been wounded in a battle against the South Saxons, whom Edric, the son of Egbert, had led against him; and he died as his wounds were being dressed. The same Edric reigned after him for a year and a half. After his death, kings of doubtful right or of foreign descent troubled the kingdom, until the lawful king, Wichtred, the son of Egbert, was established in the realm; and he, by his care in secular matters as well as spiritual, released his people from external invasion. In the same year in which king Egfrid died, he had caused that the holy and venerable Cuthbert should be ordained as a bishop for the church of Lindisfarne. He was ordained at York by Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, on the seventh of the kalends of April [26th March], being Easter Sunday, there having congregated for his consecration seven bishops; king Egfrid himself was present, this being the fifteenth year of his reign.

A. D. 687. Wilfrid, who had been expelled from his see by king Egfrid, after having undergone a long exile, was admitted to the church of Hexham; and the holy Cuthbert, knowing in his spirit that the day of his departure was at hand, returned to his island and his resting-place. On the fourth day of the first week in Lent [27th Feb.], his sickness began; and on the fourth day of the week after Mid-Lent Sunday [20th March], he departed to the Lord, worn out by a disease which had continued incessantly for three whole weeks. He died during the time of the nocturnal prayers, upon the thirteenth of the kalends of April [20th March], on the first day of the moon's age, in the third year of his episcopate, after having been an anchorite for twelve years and a monk for thirty-four, and in the fifty-fourth year after king Oswald and bishop Aidan had established a bishop's seat in the island of Lindisfarne. His body was removed into the church of the blessed apostle Peter, which is in the same island, and there was placed at the right side of the altar within a stone coffin.

A. D. 688. In this, the third year of king Alfrid, Cadwalla, the king of the West Saxons, after having energetically governed his people for two years, abandoned his kingdom for the sake of the Lord, the King Eternal, and went to Rome. His desire was to obtain the special privilege of being washed in the fountain of baptism at the shrine of the blessed apostles; for he had learned that by baptism alone is opened up for the human race an entrance to the life in heaven. His hope, furthermore, was this: that after his baptism, he should be delivered from the bonds of the flesh, and, while yet pure, should pass away to the joys of heaven. By the Lord's help, each of these his wishes was fulfilled; for on his arrival there, during the pontificate of Sergius, he was baptized, on the holy Saturday before Easter; and while yet in his white baptismal robes, he was seized with illness, by which he was liberated from the body, and associated with the blessed ones in the kingdom of heaven, upon the twelfth of the kalends of May [20th April]. He was thirty years old; and at this time Justinian was emperor, and in the fourth year of his consulate. Yna, one of the kingly family, succeeded him in the kingdom, and he governed it for thirty-seven years.

A. D. 690. Theodore, the archbishop, of blessed memory, being now an old man and full of days (for he was eighty-eight years old), died; to whom a revelation had been made in a dream as to the length of his life, and of this he frequently spoke to his friends. He had occupied his see for twenty-two years; and he was buried in the church of St. Peter, in which are interred the bodies of all the archbishops of Canterbury. Of him, and of his companions in the archbishopric, it may well and truly be said, that "their bodies are buried in peace, and their names shall live from generation to generation." [Ecclus. xlv. 13.] For I scruple not to affirm, that the English churches attained a greater degree of spiritual perfection under the government of this individual than they had ever reached before his time.

A. D. 692. Theodore was succeeded in the episcopate by Berchtwald, who had been abbot in the monastery named Racuulf, which is situated on the northern bank of the river Glenlade, at its mouth: he also was a man well versed in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and thoroughly acquainted with the rules by which churches and monasteries are governed, yet by no means to be compared with his predecessor. He was elected to the see on the first of July, while Kent was governed by Wichtred and Suefhard. He was ordained in the following year by Godwin, the metropolitan bishop of Gaul, upon the third of the kalends of July [29th June], being Sunday; and he took his seat [in his cathedral] upon Sunday, the second of the kalends of September [31st Sept.]. Among the many bishops whom he ordained was Tobias, who succeeded as bishop to the church of Rochester, upon the death of Gefmund; he was a man admirably learned in the Latin, Greek, and Saxon languages and literature. Wilfrid was expelled for the second time by king Alfrid, and was in exile for thirteen years. He went first to Rome, and on his return thence, he spent some time in the region of the Middle Angles: after having been a wanderer for a long time, he again visited Rome; and when he returned to Britain, he visited the districts of the South Saxons, who were still addicted to the rites of heathendom, and in that land he taught the gospel for five years.

A. D. 703. After a reign of thirty years over the Mercian nation, Aethelred became a monk, and resigned the kingdom to Coenred.

A. D. 705. Alfrid, king of the Northumbrians, died, before the full completion of the twentieth year of his reign, and was succeeded in the government by his son Osred, a boy of about eight years old. After he had reigned eleven years, Wilfrid was restored in peace to his see, and the remaining four years of his reign (that is, until the day of his death) passed peaceably. And thus [Wilfrid,] that most excellent bishop and venerable conqueror, ascended before the throne of God, having been a bishop for forty-five years; and his body having been conveyed to his own monastery, called Ripon, was there buried in the church of the blessed apostle Peter, with the honour due to such an illustrious bishop.

A. D. 708, (being the fourth year of the reign of king Osred,) Coenred, who for some time had held the sceptre of the kingdom of the Mercians with great reputation, resigned it with greater; for having proceeded to Rome, he there received the tonsure during the popedom of Constantine, and having become a monk, continued until the last day of his life at the threshold of the apostles, in prayers, fastings, and almsgivings. He was succeeded in his kingdom by Coelred, the son of king Aethelred, who had held the same realm before the accession of Coenred.

A. D. 711. Bertfriht, the prefect, engaged in battle with the Picts.

A. D. 716. Osred, king of the Northumbrians, was killed, and Coenred succeeded, and Coelred the king of the Mercians died, and Egbert (that man of the Lord) set the monks of Iona right as to the catholic time of holding Easter, and the ecclesiastical tonsure.

A. D. 725, (being the seventh year of king Osric, the successor of Coenred,) Wihtrud the son of Egbert, the king of Kent, died upon the ninth of the kalends of May [23d April], leaving as heirs to his kingdom (which he had held for thirty-four years and a-half) his three sons, namely, Aelbert, Eadbert, and Alfric.

In the year following, Tobias, the bishop of the church of Rochester, died, a most learned man, as we have already stated; for he had been the scholar of those teachers of blessed memory, archbishop Theodore, and abbot Adrian; wherefore he was so skilled, not only in ecclesiastical and general literature, but also in the Greek and Latin languages, that they were as familiar to him as his own native tongue. He was buried in the aisle of St. Paul the Apostle, which he had built as his own place of interment, within the church of St. Andrew. He was succeeded in his episcopal office by Aldulf, who was consecrated by archbishop Berhtwald.

A. D. 729. Two comets appeared near the sun, which struck great terror into the spectators. One of them went before the sun at his rising, and the other followed him at his setting, presaging, as it were, fearful slaughter to both east and west. Or it may be understood thus; one preceded the commencement of the day, the other that of the night, intimating that ills were impending by both day and night over the human race. The flame extended towards the north, as if it were about to set that region of the heavens on fire. They appeared in the month of January, and continued visible for nearly two weeks. At this time the Saracens, a fearful pest, devastated Gaul with a miserable slaughter; but not long after they were deservedly punished for their treachery in the same province. In this year that man of God, Egbert, departed to the Lord, upon the eighth of the kalends of May [24th April], being Easter-day, and shortly after Easter, that is to say, on the seventh of the ides of May [9th May], Osric, the king of the Northumbrians, died, after having appointed Ceonulf as his successor in the kingdom, who was the brother of his own predecessor king Coenred. Osric reigned eleven years. The commencement and progress of the reign of Ceonulf were marked by such an abundance of hostile proceedings, that it is impossible as yet to affirm what shall be their issue.

A. D. 731. Archbishop Berhtwald, exhausted by a long extended old age, died upon the fifth of the ides of January [9th Jan.], having ruled his diocese for thirty-seven years, six months, and fourteen days. In the same year Tatwine, of the province of the Mercians, was made archbishop. He was consecrated in the city of Canterbury, by those venerable men Daniel, bishop of Winchester, Igwald, bishop of London, and Aldulf, bishop of Rochester, upon Sunday the tenth of June: he was a man remarkable for his religion and prudence, and admirably versed in sacred literature. This was about the two hundred and eighty-fifth year since the arrival of the Angles in England.

A. D. 733.¹ An eclipse of the sun occurred on the eighteenth of the kalends of September [15th Aug.], about the third hour of the day, to such an extent that nearly the whole surface of the sun appeared to be covered like as with a black and horrible shield.

A. D. 734. The moon was covered with a colour like blood for nearly a whole hour, at cockcrowing upon the second of the kalends of February [31st Jan.], and after a darkness had succeeded, she regained her usual brightness. In this same year archbishop Tatwine, and Beda the doctor, ascended to the heavenly mansions.

A. D. 1065. St. Edward the king exchanged a praiseworthy life for a happy death, upon the vigil of the Epiphany [5th Jan.], after having reigned twenty-three years, six months, and twenty-seven days : he was the son of king Aethelred and of Emma, the daughter of Richard, duke of Normandy, and the brother of Edmund Ironside, by the father's side. On the second day afterwards, Harold was consecrated king.

A. D. 1066. In the following year William, earl of Normandy, came into England, and attacked this king Harold ; and upon the second of the ides of October [14th Oct.], he defeated him and his army at Hasting; and on the Nativity of our Lord next ensuing, he was elevated to the throne.

A. D. 1068.² There was a battle at Bledun.

A. D. 1069. In the eighty-third year after the body of the blessed Cuthbert had been conveyed to Durham by bishop Aldun, and in the third year of the reign of king William, that same William, the king of the English, appointed one Robert, surnamed Cumin, as earl over the people of the Northumbrians ; and he, having arrived at Durham with twelve hundred men, and conducting himself with violence against the inhabitants, was there slain with all his followers, excepting only one single individual, (who escaped although wounded,) upon the fifth of the kalends of February [28th Jan.]. Hereupon the king was very angry, and despatched one of his nobles along with an army to avenge the murder. Upon the arrival of the expedition at Alvertun, and when they were preparing to advance to Durham on the following morning, there arose such a dense mist that they could scarcely see each other, and were utterly unable to discover the road. Wondering what this might betoken, one of them told the others that the inhabitants of Durham had in their city a saint named Cuthbert, who would help and protect them in every adversity, so that no one could harm them with impunity. Upon hearing this, they all returned home.

CHRONICLE OF MELROSE.

CHRONICLE OF MELROSE.

AFTER that very truthful historian and most excellent doctor, the venerable Beda, the honour and glory of our nation, had ceased to write, none others have occurred, as far as we can discover, who have narrated events with accuracy, or in a continuous narrative; or who have devoted themselves with due diligence to the recital of occurrences, by years and seasons, so as to instruct the ignorance of us who have succeeded them, and successfully to remove the difficulties incident to the time in which we live. Pursuing this, we have bestowed some little trouble (as much, indeed, as our inertness will permit us to do, and our ability extends) upon a diligent investigation into the truth of these matters. Taking upon ourselves, therefore, to run over, with all brevity, the succession of events from those three years with which the aforesaid venerable Beda, the priest and monk of the monastery of Jarrow or Wearmouth, concludes his narrative, we shall commence with the very words of the historian himself; which, as it is well known, are as follows:—

“ In¹ the year of our Lord’s incarnation seven hundred and thirty-one, archbishop Berhtwald died of old age, on the fifth² of the ides of January [9th Jan.], having held his see 37 years, 6 months, and 14 days. In his stead, and in the same year, Tatwine was made archbishop. He was of the province of the Mercians, having been a priest in the monastery which is called Briodun. He was consecrated in the city of Canterbury by the venerable men, Daniel, bishop of Winchester, and Ingwald, bishop of London, and Alwid,³ bishop of Lichfield, and Aldulf, bishop of Rochester, on the tenth day of the month of June, being Sunday; he was a man remarkable for his religion and wisdom, and notably learned in the sacred writings.

“ Thus at this present time, bishops Tatwine and Aldulf preside over the churches of Kent; Hingwald is bishop over the province of the East Saxons; Eadburt and Eadhelac⁴ are bishops in the province of the East Angles; Daniel and Forther are bishops in the province of the West Saxons. In the province of the Mercians, Alwin is bishop; and over those people who dwell beyond the river Severn to the westward, Walstod is bishop. In the province of the Wiccians, Wilfrid is bishop; in the province of the Lindisfari, Cinbrihet is bishop; the bishopric of the Isle of Wight belongs to Daniel, bishop of the city of Winchester. The province of the South Saxons having now continued for some years without a bishop, receives the episcopal ministry from the bishop of the West Saxons. All these provinces, and the others to the south, as far as the banks of the river Humber, along with their kings, are subject to Ethelbald, king of the Mercians.

² Beda says that he died on the 13th of January, but his name occurs under 9th January in the principal Martyrologies. See Acta SS. Bolland. i. 597.

“But over the province of the Northumbrians, which is now governed by king Ceowlf,¹ four bishops now preside: Wilfrid in the church of York, Ethelwald in the church of Lindisfarne, Acca in the church of Hexham, Pictelm in that which is called Whithern; which last, from the increased number of believers, has of late become an additional episcopal see, and has him as its first bishop. The nation of the Picts at this time has a treaty of peace with the nation of the Angles; and having become a partaker of the catholic² peace and truth, rejoices therein with the universal church. The Scots who inhabit Britain, contented with their own territories, form no plots or conspiracies against the nation of the Angles. The Britons, although they, for the most part, through domestic hatred, are hostile to the nation of the Angles, and by their wicked usages oppose the custom of the whole catholic church, yet, as they are firmly opposed by both divine and human power, they can obtain their desired object on neither side; for although they are partly independent, yet they are also partly under subjection to the Angles. Such being the calm and peaceful condition of the times, many of the Northumbrian nation, as well nobles as private persons, laying aside their weapons, are minded to accept the tonsure, and to dedicate both themselves and their children to monastic vows, rather than to employ themselves in warlike occupations. What will be the issue of these things will be seen by the future age. At the present time this is the condition of the whole of Britain, about the year two hundred and eighty-five since the arrival of the Angles in Britain, but in the seven hundred and thirty-first year of our Lord’s incarnation, in whose reign let the earth ever rejoice, and let the many isles of Britain exult and be glad in his faith.”

Thus far have we been able to use the language of the venerable and most trustworthy Beda, the doctor not only of the English church, but also (as we confidently dare affirm) of the church catholic; and we have drawn, as from a most limpid fountain, these statements from the Ecclesiastical History of our nation, of which he is the author. The portion, however, which now follows, is excerpted from various sources, some from one place, some from another.

In the same year died archbishop Tatwin.

King Cudred, having made peace with earl Adelhun, whom we have already mentioned, engaged in battle at Bereford with Adalbald, the haughty king of the Mercians, who had brought forward with him the men of Kent and Mercia, as well as the East Saxons and Angles. When they joined battle, God, who resisteth the proud, scattered the power of Adalbald.

He was succeeded by Kinewald, a worthy young man of the royal race. In the same year the anchorite Balthere, having imitated the life of the saints, departed to the Lord. In this same year also died Totta, bishop of the nation of the Mercians, succeeded by Eadbert; and Frthewald, bishop of Whitherne, to whom Pictwine succeeded.

A. D. 765. Flashes of fire were seen in the sky. Adewald¹ Mol slew Oswin, a most valiant leader of his own nation, because he had risen against him. In this year the same Adewald lost the kingdom of Northumbria, which he had held for six years; he was succeeded by Aldred, who reigned eight years. Bregwin, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by Lambert. Also two other bishops died, that is to say, Hemeli, bishop of the Mercians,² succeeded by Cuthfrid; and Aldulf of Lichfield, to whom Ceolwulf succeeded.

A. D. 766. Egbert, archbishop of York, went to rest in the peace of Christ, to whom Albert succeeded. Frithbert, bishop of Hexham, departed from this world to the Lord on the tenth of the kalends of January [23d Dec.], to whom succeeded Alchmund. Frithewald,³ bishop of Chester, died.

A. D. 767. Etha, that faithful anchorite at Creic, near York, died happily.

A. D. 768. Eadbert, formerly king, died happily, being a cleric and the servant of God. In the same year pope Stephen, and Pipin, the king of the Franks, died. Alcred, king of Northumbria, took Osgeiva as his queen.

A. D. 769. Earnred the tyrant burnt Caterick, and he himself perished in the flames. In the same year the empire of the Romans, together with the kingdom of the Franks, was subjected to Charles the Great, the son of king Pipin.

A. D. 770.

A. D. 771. Sibald the abbot died. The reader Ecgric departed to the society of the elect. Offa, king of the Mercians, reduced to his subjection the Hestings by arms.

A. D. 772. Duke Pittell, and Sunuthulf the abbot, died in peace.

¹ It is probable that this is a second notice of the event already recorded A. D. 760.

² He was bishop of Lichfield. Hardy's Le Neve, iii. 540.

³ Another error here occurs, from the annalist neglecting to observe that he here introduces from the Saxon Chron. (A. D. 766) a statement which he had already inserted from Simeon, the chronology of these authorities varying two years the one from the other. Frithwald, here styled bishop of Chester, was, in fact, bishop of Whithern; and the false reading of the text proceeds from a misapprehension of the Saxon Chronicle, which states that he was consecrated "on Ceastrum," that is, at York.

A. D. 773. Hadwin, the bishop of the church "Migensis," died, and in his place Leuthfrid was appointed. Wlfeht, abbot of Beverley, departed to the Lord. Albert of York received the pall which had been sent to him from pope Adrian.

A. D. 774. King Aldred, being abandoned by his own people, left his kingdom, and went into exile; he was succeeded by Aedlred, the son of Moll. Offa, king of the Mercians, fought against the men of Kent at Otanford, and, after a fearful slaughter on both sides, he obtained the victory. During this year red appearances were seen in the heavens after sunset; and terrible snakes, which caused great wonder, were seen in Sussex.

A. D. 775. The Old Saxons, from whom the nation of the Angles is descended, were converted to Christ. In the same year Cynoth, the king of the Picts, died, and Eadulf the duke, after having been captured by fraud, was treacherously slain. The most famous Charles, king of the Franks, overcame the Saxons, and brought under his rule the province of the Bavarians, which had formerly been reduced by the Franks.

A. D. 776. Pecthwine, bishop of Whiteherne, departed to the Lord, and was succeeded by Ethelbert.

A. D. 777. Kinewulf, king of the West Saxons, fought against Offa, king of the Mercians, near Benetune,¹ but was put to flight by him. Ethelbert, the successor of Pictwine, was consecrated at York. Aldulf, Kinulf, and Ecga, the nobles of king Ethelred, were treacherously slain² at his instigation, by the chiefs Adelbald and Heardbert, on the third of the kalends of October [29th Sept.]. Hed, king of the Scots, died, and was succeeded by his son Fergus.

A. D. 778. Adelbald and Heardbert, the chiefs of king Ethelred of Northumbria, rebelled against their lord, and slew Aldulf, the son of Bosa, the leader of the army, at Kingesclive, and afterwards they slew Kinulf and Ecga, the dukes of the same king, at Hylatyrn.³ Hereupon the king fled from before their face, and they appointed as king, Alfwold, the son of king Osulf, in his stead.

A. D. 779. On the expulsion of Ethelred, Alfwold assumed the kingdom of Northumberland.

A. D. 780. The generals Osbald and Ethelard, having collected an army, burnt Bearn, the nobleman of king Alfwold, at Seletune, on the ninth of the kalends of January [24th Dec.]. Archbishop⁴ Albert departed to Christ; before his death Eanbald was ordained, and this same year received the pall which had been sent to him. Bishop Kiniwulf,⁵ casting aside the cares of the world, committed the bishopric to Higbald. Fergus, king of the Scots, died, and was succeeded by his son Seluand.

A. D. 781. Alchmund, bishop of Hexham, departed to Christ on the seventh of the ides of September [7th Sept.], and was succeeded by Tylbert.

⁴ Archbishop of York. Florence ascribes his death to the next year.

⁵ Bishop of Lindisfarne. See the Saxon Chron. A. D. 782.

A. D. 782. There was a council at Acle.

A. D. 783. Werburga, formerly queen of the Mercians, but at this time an abbess, died. In the same year bishop Kiniwulf, whom we have mentioned ¹ above, died happily.

A. D. 784. Kinewulf,² king of the West Saxons, was killed by Kinhard, the brother of Sigebert, because the king had determined to send him into exile.

A. D. 785. Brichtric succeeded Kinewulf.

A. D. 786. Bothwine, the venerable abbot of Ripon, died by a happy end, and was succeeded by Albert. In the same year Aldulf was consecrated bishop by archbishop Eanbald, and bishops Tylbert and Higbald, at Corbridge, and, after having been enriched with many gifts, was sent back to his own church. Queen Rachtrida, at this time an abbess, died. Kinhard was slain by king Osred, out of revenge for his lord, king Kinewulf. Pope Adrian sent his legates into Britain, to restore the catholic faith, and confirm it; and they were honourably received, and sent back again.

A. D. 787. A synod was assembled at Pincahale. Albert, abbot of Ripon, departed to the Lord, and Sigred was ordained in his stead.

A. D. 788. King Elfwald was slain in his innocence, by his nobleman named Siga, and his body was buried in the church at Hexham. In the place where he was slain, a light having appeared streaming down from heaven, a church was built, to the honour of the saints Oswald and Cuthbert. His nephew Osred succeeded him.

A. D. 789. Osred was driven from his kingdom by the treachery of his own people.

A. D. 790. King Ethelred, the son of Moll, was delivered from his banishment, and restored to his kingdom; he laid hold upon duke Eardulf, and having conducted him to Ripon, he there put him to death opposite the gate of the monastery. His body, however, was carried into the church; and when the brethren were singing around him for his benefit, after midnight, it was discovered that he was alive. Baldulf was ordained bishop at Whitherne.

A. D. 791. King Ethred miserably slaughtered the sons of king Elfwald, that is, Aelf and Elwine, at Wonwaldremere, after having dragged them away from York by force. Lambert, archbishop of Canterbury, departed to Christ, and was succeeded by Ethelred, abbot of the monastery "Ludensis."

A. D. 792. Osred returned from his exile along with an army; but it having deserted him, he was taken prisoner, and at the command of king Ethelred he was put to death, and buried at Tyne-mouth. King Ethelred took as his queen Elfleda, the daughter of Offa, king of the Mercians.

A. D. 793. Fiery dragons appeared in the air, and this prodigy was followed by two plagues; the former was an intolerable famine, the second proceeded from the savage cruelty of the nation of the pagans and Norwegians, who, in the same year, destroyed the monastery of Lindisfarne, killed the monks, and harassed Northumberland with considerable slaughter. In the same year Sigga, the duke who had slain king Elfwald, died a profane death by his own hand.

A. D. 794. The Northumbrians slew their king Ethelred,¹ the son of Moll; but Osbald the nobleman having been elevated to the throne, was expelled from the kingdom twenty-seven days afterwards. He assumed the religious garb, and was afterwards made abbot. Eardulf, the son of Earnulf, who (as we have already² mentioned) returned to life, was recalled from his exile, and appointed king. Egfrid, king of Kent, died, and was succeeded by Eadbrich Pren. Pope Adrian was translated to a dwelling in the heavens; he was succeeded by Leo. The nation of the pagans already mentioned plundered the monastery of king Egfrid at Donemutha,³ but not without punishment; for by the agency of the blessed Cuthbert, some of them were killed, some were shipwrecked, some were taken prisoners while yet alive, and were immediately put to death upon the shore.

A. D. 795. Charles, the king of the Franks, reduced the nation of the Huns; and after having put their prince to flight and conquered their army, he then divided the spoils among the poor people and the churches, and these spoils consisted of fifteen waggons laden with gold and silver, each of which was drawn by four oxen.

A. D. 796. Offa, king of the Mercians, (who had made a great ditch from sea to sea,) died, after a reign of thirty-nine years; he was succeeded by his son Egfrid, who died five months afterwards. Cenwulf then took the kingdom, and held it in peace for twenty-six years. He was the father of Kenelm the martyr. Eanbald, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by another of the same name. The bishops who ordained him were Ethelbert, Higbald, and Badulf.

A. D. 797. Bishop⁴ Ethelbert died, and was buried in his own church, that is, the church of Hexham; Headred was his successor. The Romans⁵ cut out the tongue of pope Leo, and after having plucked out his eyes, they drove him from the apostolic see; but by the power of God he was afterwards enabled to speak, and was restored to the apostolic see.

A. D. 798. The murderers of king Ethelred, with Wada their leader, waged war at Billinghamoh, near Waleleie, against Eardulf, the successor of Ethelred, and many persons were slain; but Wada, the leader, was put to flight, and Eardulf had the victory. London was burnt down by a sudden fire, and a large number of the inhabitants were consumed. Cenwulf, king of the Mercians, destroyed the men of Kent in a most cruel inroad; and having seized and disgraced their king, he added the kingdom to his own, and then Cuthred took it, and held it of him. A synod assembled at Pincenhalhe, under the presidency of archbishop Eanbald.

⁵ The Chronicle here returns to the computation of the Saxon Annals, from which it had departed; Simeon places this event in 799.

A. D. 799. Brorda, the chief of the Mercians, who was also named Hildegils, died. A certain abbot, named Mora, died a lamentable death, having been slain by Tilthegn, his chief officer. Moll the duke was also slain by the command of king Eardulf. The duke Aldred, he who had murdered king Ethelred, was put to death by duke Thormund, the avenger of his lord. The former duke and nobleman, Osbald, who had been king aforetime, but who at this period was an abbot, deceased, and was buried in the church at York.

A. D. 800. Headred, the bishop of the church of Hexham, died, and was succeeded by Eanbert. Alchmund, the predecessor of Ethelred, the son of king Aldred, having been seized by the guardians of king Eardulf, was put to death by his orders. A very high wind overthrew many cities and towns, and plucked up the trees by the roots, on the ninth of the kalends of January [24th Dec.]; the sea passed over its boundaries, and a severe murrain destroyed much cattle. The king Charles, relying upon his imperial majesty, condemned to death those Romans who had done dishonour to pope Leo; but he pardoned them the capital punishment upon the entreaties of that pope, and sent them away into exile.

A. D. 801. Edwin, called also Eda, formerly the duke of the Northumbrians, but at this time an abbot, died happily on the eighteenth of the kalends of February [15th Jan.], and was buried in his church at Gainford. Eardulf, the king of the Northumbrians, and Kinewulf, king of the Mercians, met together to fight; but, by the advice of the bishops and princes, they entered into a treaty of peace, to endure as long as they lived, and they confirmed it with an oath.

A. D. 802. Bichtric, king of the Western [Saxons], died by poison, which had been administered to him (although prepared and intended for another person) by queen Eadburga, the daughter of king Offa, that constant accuser of the virtuous. Passing the sea with countless treasures, she offered gifts to king Charles. The king said to her, "I give you the choice between me and my son: you shall have whom you please." She, in her wantonness, selected the son, because he was the younger of the two, and thus lost both. The king, however, gave her a monastery, in which she assumed the garb of a nun, and so clothed her hypocrisy; but having committed adultery with a certain mean person of her own nation, she was detected, and dismissed from the monastery by the king's orders, and at last she died a miserable death in Pavia, after begging her way through towns and villages. Bichtric was succeeded by Egbert, one of the royal family.

In the same year Athelwulf, when fighting against the Danes in one part of his kingdom, sent his earl Wulfard against such of them as had arrived at Hampton in thirty-three ships, and he gained a victory over them. When king Athelwulf heard of this, he, along with his son Athelbald, collected an army, and met them at a place called Aclea, and overcame them in battle.

A. D. 852. Bertulf, king of the Mercians, died, and Burchred succeeded him. In this same year the brother of Athelwulf, Athelstan, the king of the people of Kent, and earl (or duke) Alchere, defeated the army of the pagans, and took nine of their ships at Sandwich.

A. D. 853. Burchred, king of the Mercians, strengthened by the assistance of Athelwulf, the king of the West Saxons, reduced the Midland Britons, that is, the Welshmen, under his sway. Athelwulf sent his son Alfred to pope Leo, to be anointed as king; the pope received him as his son, and consecrated him.

A. D. 854. Duke Alchere, with the men of Kent, and duke Huda, with the men of Somerset, engaged the pagans at the isle [of Thanet¹], but were slain. Eardulf removed the bishopric of Lindisfarne. Burchred took [to wife] the daughter of Athelwulf. Wulfere became archbishop of York.

A. D. 855. After having given the tenth part of his kingdom to the churches of God, king Athelwulf went to Rome, where he and his son Alfred remained one year; upon his return he took to wife Judith, the daughter of Charles the Bald, the king of the Franks.

A. D. 860. King Athelbald died, and was succeeded by Athelbert, who also had taken the kingdom of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, after the death of his uncle Adelstan.

A. D. 861.

A. D. 862.

A. D. 863. St. Swithin, bishop of Winchester, ascended into the heavens. Dovenald, king of the Scots, died.

A. D. 864. Ethelbert, king of West Saxony and Kent, died, and was succeeded by his brother Ethelred.

A. D. 865. An army of the pagans, of which the leaders were Iwar and Hubba, came into England, and took up their quarters in East Anglia.

A. D. 866. The army of the pagans, which was under the direction of Iwar and Hubba, came to York. The Northumbrians cast off their king Osbrich, and took to themselves another ignoble personage named Aella.

A. D. 867. Osbrich and Aella, having made peace with each other, for their mutual advantage, marched to York, and having broken down the wall, both these kings were killed in their attack upon the pagans, and an innumerable multitude of their people fell with them; the remainder made peace with them. The Danes, however, placing themselves under a single ruler, appointed Egbert king over the Northumbrians. In the same year died Alchstan bishop of Shirburn.

A. D. 868. A comet appeared. Iwar and Hubba came from Northumbria to Nottingham, but they were opposed by Burchred, the king of the Mercians, who was strengthened by the aid of king Ethelred and his brother Alfred. Alfred took to wife the daughter of Ethelred, surnamed the Great, the earl of the Gaians, and Eadburga, one of the kingly family of the Mercians.

A. D. 869. Iwar and Hubba returned into Northumbria, pillaging and slaying very many people.

A. D. 870. Iwar and Hubba, along with many thousands of the Danes, came to East Anglia, and put to death St. Edmund, and bishop Humbert along with him. Ceolnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by Ethelred.

A. D. 871. The army of the pagans advanced into West Saxony as far as Reading; two kings, Basrech¹ and Haldene, were its leaders. Ethelwulf, the earl of Berkshire, opposing them, slew at Englefeld earl Sydroc the elder; and after four days king Athelred and his brother Alfred came up; whereupon a battle having been fought, many fell on each side, and then the before-mentioned earl Athelwulf was killed. Again, after four days, king Athelred and his brother Alfred fought against them at Essendun. The pagans divided themselves into two troops, one of which was led by the two kings already mentioned, while all the earls acted as generals to the other. Hereupon Athelred divided his army into two parts, with one of which he attacked the two kings, and slew one of them, that is, Basrech; while the second division, under Alfred, engaged with the earls, and killed four of them, namely, Sydroc the younger, Osbern, Freana, and Harold. After a few days there was again a fight at Basing, when the Danes had the victory, and bishop Alchmund was killed. Again, there was another battle at Reading. Then king Ethelred died, and was succeeded by his brother Alfred. His wife, Elswitha, bore him two sons, Edward and Agelward, and three daughters, Elfletha, Ethelgiva, and Elfthritha. After the expiration of a month, he fought against the pagans at Wilton, but the Danes had the victory, for they were numerous, while the English were few; for they had been worn out with much fighting, in which conflicts there had fallen, on the side of the pagans, one king and nine earls.

A. D. 872. Alchwin, bishop of the Wiccians, died, and was succeeded by that most learned man Werefrid, who had been ordained by Ethered, archbishop of Canterbury. At the command of king Alfred he translated into Saxon, out of the Latin language, the books of the Dialogues of the blessed Gregory. At this time the Northumbrians drove out their king Egbert, and archbishop Wulfere. The army of the pagans proceeded from Reading to London, and there passed the winter; the people of Mercia made peace with them.

A. D. 873. The army of the pagans already mentioned, with their king Haldene, spent the winter at Torkesey in Lindsey. Egbert, the king of the Northumbrians, died, and Ricsic was made king. Wulfere the archbishop was restored to his see.

A. D. 874. Aldene and his army, having removed themselves from Lindsey, spent the winter at Repedune, where three other kings took up their abode with him, that is to say, Godrun, Osketin, and Andwen; and they expelled king Burchred from the kingdom of the Mercians. He went to Rome, and there he died, and was buried in the church of St. Mary, within the Saxon school. The Danes entrusted the kingdom of the Mercians to Ceolwulf.

A. D. 875. One portion of the army under Haldene, having reduced Northumbria under their jurisdiction, there remained; while the other part, under three kings, passed the winter at Cambridge. In a naval battle against¹ seven of the ships of the pagans, king Alfred took one of them, and the others escaped by flight. Bishop Eardulf and abbot Edred, having taken the body of St. Cuthbert from Lindisfarne, wandered about here and there for seven years.

A. D. 876. Ricsig, king of the Northumbrians, died, and was succeeded by Egbert. The army of the three kings came to Werham,² and West Saxony. King Alfred entered into a treaty of peace with them, and took hostages from them; but on the night next ensuing they broke the treaty and departed, and plundered round about Exeter, that is, Caerwisc. The heathen Rollo, a Dane by nation, invaded Normandy with his people, and took possession of it; he was afterwards baptized, and called Rodbert.

A. D. 877. The naval force of the pagans perished in the sea with one hundred and twenty [ships³], and Haldene with twenty-three ships sailed to Devonshire, where they were put to death by the followers of king Alfred, and with them one thousand, two hundred, and twenty men. The other army went from Exeter to Chippenham, along with a great multitude, which had recently arrived from Denmark. But king Alfred being deserted by his followers, and left with a few persons, hid himself in the forests. But after a time, having been encouraged in a vision by the blessed Cuthbert, he advanced against his enemies to a place called Ethan-dun, and overcame them in battle; and they, losing confidence, gave hostages, and made oath that they would depart from the kingdom; and their king, Godrun, promised that he would become a Christian.

A. D. 878. Godrun was baptized, and king Alfred received him from the holy font, and afterwards he gave him East Anglia, in which St. Aedmund had reigned, and he called him Athelstan. Charles the Bald, the king of the Franks, died.

A. D. 879. A new army of the pagans came into England, and took up their abode at Fulenham [Fulham], near the river Thames. Het, the king of the Scots, is killed.

A. D. 880. Godrun, with his people, began to inhabit East Anglia. The army which had come to Fulenham [Fulham] passed over the sea, and remained for one year at Ghent. Louis, king of the Franks, the son of Charles the Great, died.

A. D. 881. When the same army came into France, it introduced war, and had a taste of it. At this time many monasteries of the Franks were devastated; so much so, that the brethren of the monastery of St. Benedict¹ took up his bones out of their tomb, and wandered about hither and thither.

A. D. 882. The same army came into France by the river Meuse, and there settled for the winter. King Alfred overcame the ships of the pagans in a naval battle, and captured two of them.

A. D. 883. The army which has been already mentioned occupied Cundoth,² and committed depredations therein for one year. King Alfred (as we have already mentioned), upon the death of Iwar and Haldene, began to people those parts of Northumbria which had been devastated. At this time St. Cuthbert appeared in a vision to abbot Eadred, and commanded him to announce to the bishop, and the whole nation of the Angles and Danes, that they should redeem, by the payment of the purchase-money, Guthred, the son of Ardecnut, whom the Danes had sold as a slave to a certain widow woman at Witingeham,³ and should make him king over the Northumbrians. This was done, and he reigned over York. Then the see, which had formerly existed at Lindisfarne, was fixed at Cuncacestre [Chester-le-Street].

A. D. 884. Pope Marinus sent⁴ many presents to king Alfred, amongst which was a small portion of the wood of our Lord's cross; and, out of his affection for him, he freed the school of the Saxons from all tribute and tax.

A. D. 885. The army of the pagans, which we have already mentioned, was divided into two parts, of which one went into the eastern part of France; the other, returning into England, laid siege to Rochester; but king Alfred drove them away, and raised the siege. King Alfred sent a naval army for the defence of East Anglia, and there sixteen piratical vessels were discovered and captured at Sturemuth.⁵ On their return, however, they fell in with a large force of the pagans, and, having engaged them, they were conquered. In the same year, while Charles, the king of the Franks, was hunting, he was torn by the tusks of a wild boar, and was succeeded by his brother Louis; their father Louis was the brother of the queen Judith, whom Athelwulf had married. Pope Marinus died.

A. D. 886. The pagan army returned from the eastern part of France into the western, and came to Paris by the river Seine; they besieged the city for a whole year, but without any success. King Alfred laid siege to the city of London, and took it; the Angles flocked to him, and the Danes retreated. He entrusted Ethelred, the earl of the Mercians, with the restoration of the city.

A. D. 887. Abandoning the city of Paris, the army of the pagans went by the Seine to the Marne, and so to Caedzi [Chezy], and they there spent a year in plundering; and having entered the mouth of the river Jorna [Yonne], they remained a year there, to the great damage of the district. Charles, the king of the Franks, was expelled from his kingdom by his brother's son, Ernulf; forty days after which he died. The kingdom of the Franks having been hereupon divided into five parts, this same Ernulf obtained the districts to the east of the river Rhine; Rodulf had the midland kingdom, Odo the western; while Lombardy, and all the regions on that side of the mountains, became the property of Brengar and Wido.

A. D. 888. King Alfred built two monasteries: one for monks, in the place called Eathelingeie; the other for nuns, near the eastern gate of Shaftsbury, and herein he placed, as its abbess, his daughter Ethelgiva.

hands of the Danes East Saxony, East Anglia, and very many provinces of Mercia. His brother Athelwold, contrary to the wishes both of the king and the people, took to wife a certain consecrated virgin, and held Winburn against the king. Being driven from thence, he departed into Northumbria, and there he was made their king and their chief ruler. King Edward had four sons; the eldest was Athelstan, who was born of a most noble woman, named Egwinna. By his queen Edgiva he had Edwin, Edmund, and Edred: he had also four daughters—Eadburga the virgin; the second became the wife of Otto, the emperor of the Romans; the third married Charles, the king of the Franks; the fourth was the wife of Sihtric, the king of the Northumbrians. A. D. 940. King Athelstan died on the sixth¹ of the kalends of November, on the fourth day of the week, and in the fourteenth indiction; he was buried at Malmesbury, and was succeeded by his brother Edmund.

A. D. 941. Casting off the fealty which they had sworn to Edmund, the Northumbrians chose as their own king Anlaf, king of the Norwegians. He came to Hampton [Southampton], and besieged it; but prevailing nothing, he marched his army to Tamworth, and, having pillaged the whole country, he was on his return, when he was encountered by king Edmund, and they immediately would have joined in battle, had not the two archbishops, Odo and Wulstan, appeased them. So peace was made, and Wathlingestrete was fixed as the limit of each kingdom. Immediately after having burnt and plundered the church of St. Baldred, in Tinningham,² Anlaf died. The son of Sihtric, also named Anlaf, reigned in the stead of his father.

A. D. 942. King Edmund took five cities, namely, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, and Stamford, entirely out of the hands of the Danes.

A. D. 943. When Elfgiva, the holy queen of king Edmund, gave birth to Edgar, St. Dunstan—at that time abbot of Glastonbury, but afterwards bishop of Winchester—heard voices singing on high, and saying, “Peace to the church of the Angles in the time of our St. Dunstan, and the boy now born!” In the same year king Edmund, after having overcome by force king Anlaf, the son of Sihtric, gave credence to his professions, and received him from the holy laver [of baptism], and afterwards stood for king Reinold, while he was being confirmed by the bishop. Constantine, king of the Scots, died.

danger of being killed by a wicked robber named Leof, was himself slain by that person, at Widechirche, upon the third¹ day of the week, being the day of St. Augustine, the teacher of the Angles, in the fourth indiction, and was buried at Glastonbury. His brother Edred succeeded him, and was consecrated by St. Odo, the archbishop. In the same year he obtained possession of Northumbria, which had rebelled against him; and the Scots submitted to him without fighting,

A. D. 947. Anlaf, who had been driven from the kingdom of Northumbria, returned with a fleet, and was restored to the realm.

A. D. 948. The Northumbrians cast off Anlaf, and swore fealty to Edred, the king of the Angles; but they did not long preserve it.

A. D. 949. The Northumbrians (who do not know what it is to keep faith) appointed one Eyríc, of Danish descent, to be king over them.

A. D. 950. Edred, the king of the Angles, ravaged Northumberland; and in this devastation the monastery which St. Wilfrid had built at Ripon was burnt down. The Northumbrians, in their fear, cast off Eyríc, the son of Harold, whom they had constituted their king. He was the last of their kings, and after him came earls;² the first of whom was Osulf, with whom Oslac was afterwards associated. The elder Walleve succeeded; after whom came his son Uhtred, and after Uhtred came his brother Edolf-Cudel, and after him his brother Aldred. He was succeeded by Eadulf, the son of Cospatric, the son of the Uhtred already mentioned. To Eadulf succeeded Siward, and after him Tosti, the brother of king Harold; then came Morkar, who entrusted the earldom to Osulf, the son of earl Edulf; upon the expulsion of whom, Cospí succeeded, and after him Cospatric, the son of Maldred. This Cospatric was the son of Maldred, by Aldgitha, the daughter of earl Uhtred, and Elfgiva, the daughter of king Ethelred. This Cospatric was the father of Dolfin, Walleve, and Cospatric. After him, the earldom was given to Waltheve, the son of earl Siward. When Waltheve was taken prisoner, the earldom was entrusted to the care of bishop Walcher; upon whose death, the king gave the earldom to Albius; but he having returned home to his country, Robert de Moubrai succeeded. Upon his capture, the kings themselves henceforth retained the earldom in their own hands; first of all, William the younger, then Henry, afterwards Stephen, and after him Henry the Second.

A. D. 951. St. Elphege,³ bishop of Winchester, was removed from this world; his successor was Elfsi.

A. D. 952. Edred, king of the Angles, placed Wulstan, archbishop of York, in the closest custody.

A. D. 953. Upon the release of Wulstan from his confinement, the honour of the episcopate was restored to Dorchester.

² This account of the earls of Northumberland is abridged from Simeon of Durham.

³ The chronology again returns to that of the Saxon Chronicle, from which authority we learn that the obit occurred upon 12th March.

A. D. 954. Edred, the king of the Angles, being sick, sent for St. Dunstan the abbot, his confessor. As he was on his way to the palace, a voice sounded in his ears, which said, "King Edred now rests in peace." His horse, unable to bear this voice, fell to the ground, and died. The king was buried at Winchester, and was succeeded by Edwy, the son of his brother Edmund, by the holy queen Ealfgiva; he was consecrated by archbishop Odo.

A. D. 955.

A. D. 956. The blessed abbot Dunstan, having been proscribed by king Edwy, for the cause of justice, passed over the sea, and spent the period of his banishment in the monastery which is called Blandinum. Wulstan, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by Oskitell.

A. D. 957. The people of Mercia and Northumberland, despising king Edwy, chose his brother Edgar, who forthwith recalled the blessed Dunstan from his exile, and upon the decease of Kinewald he gave him the bishopric of Worcester, and he was consecrated by archbishop Odo. Louis, the king of the Franks, died; he was the son of king Ralph, and was succeeded by Lothaire. The dominical letter was D.

A. D. 958. St. Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, departed to Christ. He was succeeded by Elflus,¹ the bishop of Winchester, in whose stead Brihtelm was ordained.

A. D. 959. Elfsy, archbishop of Canterbury, died from exposure to the severity of the cold, while he was in the Alpine mountains, being at that time on his way to Rome to procure his pall. In the same year died king Edwy, and was buried at Winchester; and his brother Edgar became monarch of the whole of England, being then in the seventeenth year of his age, five hundred and ten years after the arrival of the Angles in Britain, and three hundred and sixty-three years from that of St. Augustine. In this same year Brihtelm, bishop of the people of Dorset, was elected to the primacy of the see of Canterbury; but appearing to be somewhat inefficient, he returned to his own diocese at the king's command. Hereupon the blessed Dunstan, bishop of Worcester, by God's will and at the instigation of the counsellors, was appointed primate and patriarch of the Angles. Profiting much by his teaching and learning, king Edgar expelled the trifling secular clerks from their abodes, and appointed forty monasteries of monks.

A. D. 960. St. Dunstan, having gone to Rome, in the third indiction, obtained the pall from pope John; and on his return he procured from the king, by his entreaties, that the humble monk Oswald (the cousin of his predecessor Odo) should be ordained bishop of the see of Worcester; and so the holy man Oswald was consecrated by the blessed Dunstan.

A. D. 961. Indulf, the king of the Scots, was killed.

A. D. 962.

A. D. 963. The venerable abbot Aethelwold, who had been brought up by the blessed Dunstan, succeeded Brihtelm in the episcopal see of Winchester. At the command of king Edgar, St. Adelwold expelled the clerks and introduced monks into the old monastery of Winchester.

A. D. 964. The peaceful king of the Angles, Edgar, took to wife the daughter of Ordgar, the duke of Devonshire, Elsthrida by name; by whom he had two sons, Edmund and Egelred. By Elfleda the Fair, the daughter of duke Ordmer, he had previously had Edward (who was afterwards king and martyr), and by St. Wultritha he had Edgitha, a virgin dedicated to God. In the same year king Edgar placed monks in New Minster and Middilton, and appointed as their abbots Etelgar and Kineard respectively.

A. D. 965. Duf, the king of the Scots, was slain.

A. D. 966.

A. D. 967. King Edgar placed nuns (and St. Merwinna as their abbess) in the monastery of Rumsey, which had been built by his grandfather, king Edward.

A. D. 968. Bishop Aldred died at St. Cuthbert's, in Conkecestre; he was succeeded by Elfy.¹ The Sunday letter was D.

A. D. 969. That peaceful king of the English, Edgar, gave injunctions to his holy bishops, Dunstan of Canterbury, Oswald of Worcester, and Etwold,² that they should expel the clerks and introduce monks into the larger monasteries throughout Mercia. In the execution of this order, St. Oswald placed monks in the church of Worcester, and placed over them the religious man Wisin. Culenus, the king of the Scot's, was slain.

A. D. 970. St. Ethelwold the bishop raised from the tomb the relics of St. Swithun, and most affectionately deposited them in the church of the apostles St. Peter and Paul.

A. D. 971. Edmund the etheling, the son of king Edgar, died; likewise Ordgar, duke of Devonshire, the father-in-law of the king. The former of these was buried in the monastery of Rumsey, and the second was buried with much honour at Exeter.

A. D. 972. Oshitell, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by his kinsman Oswald, bishop of Worcester, who received the pall from pope Stephen.

A. D. 973. The peaceful king of England, Edgar, was consecrated as the first king of the whole island of Britain, at the city Accamanni,³ by the blessed prelates Dunstan and Oswald, and by the other bishops of the whole of England, with the greatest honour and glory. No long time afterwards he sailed round the northern part of Britain with an immense fleet, and landed at the city of Chester, where he had directed that he should be met by eight inferior kings; namely, Kineth, the king of the Scots; Malcolm, king of the Cumbrians; and Maccus, the king of many of the islands; and five others, that is to say, Dufnal, Sifert, Huwal, Jacob, and Ulkil; who should make oath that they would be faithful to him, and would assist him by land and sea. He entered into a boat with them one day; and when they had taken their places at the oars, he assumed the rudder, and skilfully steered through the stream of the river De, while they sailed from the palace to the monastery of St. John the Baptist, attended by a large company of dukes and nobles, who also went by water. Here he made an address to them, and then sailed back to his palace with the same pomp; and as he entered into it, he is reported to have remarked to his nobles, that now at length it might be allowed to all his successors to boast that at last he had become monarch of England, when he could make such honourable processions, and had so many kings to minister to him.

A. D. 974. A very great earthquake occurred throughout all England.

A. D. 975. The peace-loving king Edgar,—the monarch of the English realm, the flower and the honour of its kings, no less remarkable among the English than was Romulus among the Romans, Cyrus among the Persians, Alexander among the Macedonians, Charles the Great among the Franks, or Arthur among the Britons—after having done all that it became a prince to do, departed from this life on the eighth of the ides of July, in the thirty-second year of his age, and left Edward (afterwards king and martyr) the heir of his kingdom and his virtues. His body was carried to Glastonbury, and there buried in kingly manner. During his lifetime he had assembled three thousand six hundred stout ships; and each year, after Easter, it was his custom to collect one thousand two hundred on the eastern coast of the island, as many on the western, and as many on the southern. He then used to sail towards the west in the eastern fleet; and having dismissed it, he then went northwards with the western squadron; which having been sent homewards, he then returned in the northern to the eastern fleet. By this arrangement, he sailed round the whole island every summer; and his object in doing this was to defend his kingdom against internal disturbances, and to exercise his men in warlike occupations. During the time of winter and spring, it was his wont to travel throughout all the provinces of England, and diligently to investigate how the laws and statutes which had been decreed were observed by his chief men, lest the poor should be wrongfully oppressed, and their suits prejudged by their stronger neighbours. In the former of these customs he showed himself an encourager of fortitude, in the other of justice, and in both he exhibited his regard for the interests of the state and the kingdom. This caused fear everywhere to his enemies, and increased the love which was borne to him by all his subjects. The whole condition of the kingdom was disturbed by his decease, and, after the peaceful time of rejoicing which had extended throughout the whole of his reign, distress began to spring up everywhere. There was a great dispute about the thrusting of the monks from the monasteries, and the choice of a king; but at last, by the instrumentality of the archbishops Dunstan and Oswald, and other catholic men, who resisted the opposition made against the monks, they were able firmly to retain their possessions. Edward the etheling was consecrated king, as his father had directed; and, for the time, his brother Eilred was passed by. A comet appeared this autumn.

A. D. 976.

A. D. 977. A very great synod was held in East Anglia, at a town called Kireling.¹ Afterwards, while another synod was sitting at Calne, the elders of the whole of England who were there assembled, with the exception of St. Dunstan, fell from the upper chamber. Some of them were killed, and some of them escaped the peril of death with difficulty.

A. D. 978. Edward, king of England, was secretly stabbed with a dagger by the orders of his step-mother, queen Alstritha, at a place called Corvesgate; and so was unjustly slain by his own people. He was buried at Werham, in a fashion unbecoming a king. His brother Eldred, the illustrious etheling, (of elegant manners, a beautiful countenance, and comely presence,) was consecrated king at Kingistun, after the festival of Easter, upon Sunday, the eighteenth of the kalends of May [14th April], by the holy archbishops Dunstan and Oswald, and ten bishops. He held the kingdom for thirty-eight years, in many calamities, and this on account of the murder of his brother, whom his mother had wickedly slain. The blessed Dunstan had openly prophesied (for he was full of the spirit of prophecy) that these troubles would happen to him in his kingdom, using these words: "Inasmuch as thou hast aspired to the kingdom by the death of thy brother, whom thy mother ignominiously slew, therefore hear thou the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord: The sword shall not depart from thy house, but shall rage against thee all the days of thy life, and shall slay thy seed, until thy kingdom shall be transferred into another kingdom, the service and language of which the nation over which thou rulest knoweth not; nor shall thy sin, nor the sin of thy mother, nor the sins of the men who entered with thee into this wicked counsel, be expiated save by a long punishment." Therefore, after this there appeared over the whole of England, at midnight, a cloud, at one time like blood, at another time like fire, and afterwards it separated itself into various rays, and assumed divers colours, and then disappeared altogether about the dawn of day.

A. D. 979. Pope John died, and was succeeded by Benedict. Ailtritha, formerly the queen, and the murderess of St. Edward the king, in her repentance, built two monasteries, Warewelle and Ambresbiri. Elfer, the duke of the Mercians, came to Werram, with a great multitude of people, and gave orders that the body of St. Edward, the king and martyr, should be taken up from the tomb, wherewith many miracles had been performed. When the earth was removed, it was discovered that the body was whole and entire from every wound and corruption; and, after having been washed and clothed in new garments, it was conveyed to Scatesbiri,² and there honourably buried.

A. D. 980. Pope Benedict died, and was succeeded by Dionysius, the one hundred and fortieth pope. Southampton was pillaged by the Danish pirates, and nearly all its citizens were either killed or carried away into captivity. Afterwards the island of Tenethland, and the province of the city of Legions,¹ were destroyed by these Norwegian freebooters.

A. D. 981. The monastery of St. Petroc the confessor, in Cornwall, was consumed by these same pirates, who made frequent descents on the sea-coasts in Cornwall and Devonshire.

A. D. 982. Pope Dionysius died, and was succeeded by Boniface; but he dying in the same year, Benedict became pope. Four piratical vessels landed at Porland, and devastated the provinces of the people of Dorset. The city of London was destroyed by fire.

A. D. 983. Elfere, the duke of the Mercians, the kinsman of Edgar, king of England, died, and his son Alfric took the duchy.

A. D. 984. St. Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, departed to Christ, on the kalends of August [1st Aug.], and was succeeded by St. Elfeg, abbot of Bath. He assumed the religious garb in the monastery of Horehirst.²

A. D. 985.

A. D. 986. Eldred, the king of the English, in consequence of some disagreements, laid siege to the city of Rochester; but gaining nothing, he departed thence in anger, and ravaged the lands of St. Andrew the Apostle. Elfric, the duke of the Mercians, the son of duke Elfere, was expelled from England.

A. D. 987. Lothaire, the king of the Franks, died; his successor was Louis. A fever among the men, and a murrain among the cattle, (which was called in English, "Stric,"³) fearfully ravaged the whole of England.

A. D. 988. The Danish pirates plundered Wecedport; but they were attacked by the men of Devonshire, and the English, at the last, remained in possession of the field of battle; but they lost their chief leader,⁴ and a very brave soldier named Strenwold, along with many others. St. Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, departed to the Lord; he was succeeded by Etelgar, bishop of Selsey, who filled it for one year and three months. Louis,⁵ the miserable king of the Franks, died, and was succeeded by Hugh, the son of Hugh Caphet.

A. D. 989.

A. D. 990. Elfly, the bishop of St. Cuthbert, at Cunakecestre, died; his successor was Aldwin.

A. D. 991. Edelhre, archbishop of Canterbury, dying, his successor was Siricius. Gipewic was pillaged by the Danes; and on this occasion Britwold, the valiant duke of the Eastern Angles, was slain, along with a countless multitude on both sides. The Danes obtained the victory near Meldun. In this year also, by the advice of Siricius, archbishop of Canterbury, and the other nobles, tribute was paid to the Danes for the first time, upon condition that they would observe a strict peace: it amounted to ten thousand pounds. St. Oswald, the archbishop, dedicated the monastery of Ramsey, which had been erected by himself, and that friend of God, Ethelwin, the duke of the East Angles.

A. D. 992. St. Oswald the archbishop passed to the Lord, on the day before the kalends of March [29th Feb.], while (according to the usual custom) he was observing the Maunday before the feet of the poor. He was buried in the church of St. Mary, which he had erected from its foundations. His successor was Adulf, abbot of Medeshamstede [Peterborough]. Duke Ethelwin died.

A. D. 993. The army of the Danes broke into Baembrac [Bam-borough], and plundered it; and afterwards consumed the greater part of Lindsey and Northumberland.

A. D. 994. Pope Benedict died, and was succeeded by John; who dying in the same year, another of the same name followed. Anlaf, king of the Norwegians, and Suane, king of the Danes, came to London with ninety-four vessels; but they were repelled by the citizens, yet not without great loss to their own troops. Hereupon, in their fury, they ravaged the whole of England, sparing neither sex nor age, and employed fire and sword like madmen. A tribute of sixteen thousand pounds was paid to them. After this, king Eilred took as his adopted son king Anlaf, he having been confirmed by St. Elfeg, and sent him back into his own country, whence he was not to return. Richard,¹ the first duke of the Normans, died, and was succeeded by his son Richard.

A. D. 995. Bishop Aldun translated the body of St. Cuthbert from Chester to Durham. Pope John died, and was succeeded by another John.

A. D. 996. Siricius, archbishop of Canterbury, died; he expelled the clerks from out of Kent, and introduced monks. Alfric was consecrated as archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 997. The Danish army, which had remained in England, destroyed the greater portion of several provinces, slaughtered many of the inhabitants, and burnt the monastery of Tavistoke, and then returned to the ships, laden with immense booty. They passed the winter in the same place.

A. D. 998. The army of the pagans (which we have already mentioned) having been driven to the mouth of the river Fronte,² devastated by far the larger part of Dorsetshire, and paid frequent visits to the Isle of Wight. An army was frequently assembled to oppose such a calamity, but it miserably and unfortunately happened that the enemy were the victors.

A. D. 999. The army of the pagans entered the mouth of the Thames, and passing up the river Medway, proceeded to Rochester, and laid siege to it for a few days, and there they carried on a sharp war with the men of Kent, but the enemies were victorious. Hereupon they ravaged nearly the whole of the western portion of Kent.

² From-muth, Sax. Chron.; Frome, Sim. Durh.

A. D. 1000. The Danish fleet went to Normandy. Eilred, the king of the English, depopulated almost the entire land of the Cumbrians. Hugh, the king of the Franks, the son of Hugh Capeth, died, and was succeeded by his son Robert.

A. D. 1001. The army of the pagans, having returned from Normandy to England, entered the mouth of the river [Exe],¹ and unsuccessfully attempted to take the city of Exeter; whereupon, being exceedingly incensed, they wandered through Devonshire, according to their usual custom burning down towns, ravaging the country, and murdering the inhabitants; upon this, the men of Devonshire and Somersetshire having united their forces, engaged them in battle; but the English giving way, and taking to flight, the enemy were victorious.

A. D. 1002. Eilred, the king of the English, having taken counsel with his people, determined upon paying twenty-four thousand pounds, in order that he might have peace. In the same year king Eilred married Emma (who in English is called Elfgiva), the daughter of Richard, the first duke of the Normans. Adulf, archbishop of York, raised from the tomb the bones of his predecessor, St. Oswald, and placed them honourably in a shrine; and not long afterwards he died, and was succeeded by abbot Wulstan.

A. D. 1003. Suane, the king of the Danes, broke into Exeter, and plundered it, and destroyed its wall; and then they attacked the province of Wiltshire. Upon this the inhabitants of Wiltshire and Hampshire assembled together like men of courage; and just as they were about to engage with the enemy, duke Alfric began to make himself sick, and, in the excess of his sluggish cowardice, he grew frightened, and so they turned away from the foe without fighting. Perceiving this, Suane and his army destroyed Wilton and Salisbury by fire, and then returned to his ships.

A. D. 1004. Suane, the king of the Danes, went by sea to Norwich, which he pillaged and burnt. Thereupon Ulfketel, the bold earl of the East Anglians, who had come up unexpectedly, finding that there was no room for his troops to engage those of the enemy, made peace with them, after deliberating the matter with his own people; but it was shortly after violated by the king of the Danes, who burnt Thetford. Ulfketel, when he understood this, collected his army, and boldly attacked the enemy; many fell on both sides, and the Danes escaped with difficulty; and (as they themselves admitted) they had never experienced a sharper attack while in England. Pope John died, and was succeeded by Gregory.

A. D. 1005. A severe famine overrun England, upon which Suane, the Danish king, returned to Denmark, but his absence was to be of no long duration. Pope Gregory died, and was succeeded by John, who, dying in the same year, had for his successor Silvester, named also Gerbert. It is reported that this Gerbert did homage to the devil, in order that by this means he might attain unto the honours of this world; whereupon it was said, "Gerbert advances from R. to R., and becomes a successful pope R." The meaning of this is, that he was promoted from the archbishopric of Rheims to that of the city of Ravenna, which at that time stood very high among the sees, and then at last he attained the supreme dignity of the Roman chair. It is further reported that at a later time the stings of his conscience, and some bodily affliction, so goaded him, that he cut off his hands and feet, and threw them as an offering to the devil, and so the mutilated trunk which remained died, and he was canonized as a saint.

A. D. 1006. Alfric, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by Elfeg, bishop of Winchester, in whose stead Kenulf was appointed bishop. The Danish fleet came to England, and ravaged all by fire and sword; for after having devastated Kent, Sussex, the province of Hampshire, and Berkshire, they returned to their ships with their booty.

A. D. 1007. Pope Silvester died, and was succeeded by John. Compelled by necessity, king Eilred undertook to pay to the Danes an annual tribute of thirty-six thousand pounds, in order that the peace might be henceforth observed. In this year also the king appointed as duke of the Mercians, Edric, surnamed Streone, who (although he was the king's own son-in-law) was a traitor, and afterwards betrayed his country.

A. D. 1008. Pope John died, and was succeeded by another John. King Eilred strictly commanded that ships should be built everywhere through England, that he might defend his own kingdom from the inroads of foreigners.

A. D. 1009. Pope John died, and was succeeded by pope Sergius. Earl Turkill, with his fleet, and Heming and Ailaf, with a countless army of Danes, landed at the island of Tenetland [Thanet]; and as they were about to storm the city of Canterbury, the inhabitants surrendered, as did those of the eastern parts of Kent, and gave them three thousand pounds to have a firm peace. Afterwards king Eilred would have had a complete triumph over them, had not the perfidious duke Edric prevented it.

A. D. 1010. The same Danish army devastated nearly the whole of the southern part of England as far as Lincolnshire, burning all as they advanced; and (alas! that we must record it) they gained a victory over the East Angles¹ in battle.

A. D. 1011. Pope Sergius died, and was succeeded by Benedict. The Danes miserably destroyed the city of Canterbury with fire and sword, and took prisoner St. Elfeg, the archbishop, and Godwin, bishop of Rochester, and the abbess Leofruna,² after having plundered the cathedral of Christ Church; they also captured Elfrid, the king's provost, and monks, and clerks, and a countless multitude of both sexes of the common people. St. Elfeg was kept in chains, and exposed to various insults; and after having been severely wounded, he was carried off to the fleet, thrust into prison, and there kept in misery for seven months. Monks, men, women, and children, were decimated; that is, nine were put to death, the tenth was saved.¹ Those who escaped were in all four monks and eight hundred men. In the meantime the anger of God raged upon this murderous people, for two thousand of them died from a certain painful disorder of the bowels; but neither yet did they make satisfaction to God and his high priest.

A. D. 1012. Edric Streona, that treacherous duke, and all the chief men of England, assembled at London, and paid to the Danes the tribute of forty-eight thousand pounds,² which had been promised. While this was going on, on the holy Saturday before Easter Sunday [12th April], the Danes made this proposition to St. Elfeg, that if he wished to save his life and recover his liberty, he must pay three thousand pounds. This he refused to do, and they reserved his murder for the following Saturday. On its arrival, they, in the fury of their spirit, drunken with excess of wine, dragged him out of his prison to their place of assemblage; they struck him with the back of their axes, they nearly bury him under the stones, bones, and heads of oxen, with which they assail him. At length, one of them named Trum (whom he had confirmed the day before), moved with a kind of cruel pity, dashed his hatchet into the archbishop's head, who forthwith fell asleep in the Lord. On the following day his body was conveyed to London, and was honourably buried in the church of St. Paul, by Elnoth, bishop of Lincoln, and Alfun of London, and by the citizens.

A. D. 1013.³ St. Edmund, in his armour, slew in a discussion, at Gainesburc, that tyrant and blasphemer, Suane, who saw his assailant, and cried out as he saw him. Upon his death, the Danish fleet appointed [as king] his son Cnut; but the elders of England recalled from Normandy, Elred as their king.

A. D. 1014. Leving received the archbishopric of Canterbury. Suane, king of the Danes, arrived in England with a powerful fleet, and, like a possessed madman, he ravaged nearly the whole of England, and reduced it under his own power, and received its hostages. Perceiving this, king Eilred, with his wife and children, went to Normandy to duke Richard.

A. D. 1015. King Eilred beginning to sicken, his son Edmund Ironside had the charge of the kingdom; but many gave hostages to Cnut, who was occupied in a general plundering, and, among others, the traitor Edric made submission.

A. D. 1016. King Eilred, the bishops, abbots, and the more noble of the English people, chose Cnut as their king; but the citizens of London, and a portion of the nobility, elevated Edmund Ironside to that dignity. He engaged in battle with Cnut on six occasions, and at almost each time he was the conqueror; and so peace being made between him and Cnut, they divided England between themselves. But some traitor or other, who had hidden himself beneath the privy house to which Edmund had retired for the necessary purposes of nature, stabbed him near the private parts, which were at that time bared, and he died.¹

A. D. 1017. King Cnut, the son of Suane, received the rule of the whole of England; and after Edwin the etheling, the brother of king Edmund, had been put to death, he sent Edmund and Aedward, the sons of the same king, to the king of the Suavi, that they should be murdered. But he, being unwilling to kill these innocent youths, sent them to Salomon, the king of Hungary, that they might be brought up by him. In the course of time Edmund died there, but Edward took to wife Agatha, the daughter of the German emperor, Henry, by whom he became the father of Margaret, who was afterwards the queen of the Scots, Christina the nun, and Aedgar the etheling. King Cnut married Emma, who had formerly been queen, by whom he had Hardecnut, who afterwards became king of the Danes and Angles, and a daughter, Gunnilda, who afterwards married Henry, the emperor of the Romans.

A. D. 1018. At Christmas king Cnut caused the traitorous duke Edric Streona to be put to death in the palace, being apprehensive that at some time or other he would be entrapped by him, as his former masters, Egelred and Eadmund, had frequently been. He directed, moreover, that his dead body should be exposed upon the city wall, and then cast down without burial. Three other innocent persons, the noble sons of dukes, were put to death. Aldun, bishop of Durham, died. A great battle was fought at Carham² between the English and the Scots. The Angles and the Danes came to an agreement at Oxford, that the law of king Edgar should be observed.

A. D. 1019. Cnut, the king of the English and of the Danes, went to Denmark, and remained there during the whole winter.

A. D. 1020. Upon his return to England, king Cnut held a great council at Cirecestre at Easter [17th April]. Edmund became bishop of Durham. Living, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by Agelnoth, who was called the Good.

A. D. 1021. Algar, the bishop of the East Angles, died; his successor was Aldwin.

A. D. 1022. Archbishop Agelnoth went to Rome, and received his pall from pope Benedict.

A. D. 1023. The body of the blessed Elpheg the martyr was translated from London to Canterbury. Wulstan, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by Alfric, the provost of Winchester.

A. D. 1024 and 1025. Nothing worthy of remembrance occurred. Pope Benedict died, and was succeeded by John.

A. D. 1026. Alfric, archbishop of York, went to Rome, and received the pall from pope John. Richard the Second, the duke of the Normans, died, and was succeeded by Richard the Third, who, dying in the same year, had for his successor his brother Rodbert.

¹ This story does not occur in either the Saxon Chronicle or Simeon, but it is to be found in Henry of Huntingdon, Bromton, and Knyghton.

² Probably at Carham upon the Tweed.

A. D. 1027. King Cnut blinded the eyes of the Norwegians with an abundance of gold and silver, while they lightly esteemed their own king Olave, on account of his sanctity.

A. D. 1028. King Cnut went to Norway with fifty large ships, and having expelled king Olave thence, he subjugated it for himself.

A. D. 1029. Cnut, the king of the Angles, Danes, and Norwegians, returned to England.

A. D. 1030. St. Olave, the king and martyr, the son of Harold, king of the Norwegians, whom king Cnut had expelled, having returned into Norway, was unrighteously killed by the Norwegians.

A. D. 1031. King Cnut having gone [to Rome]¹ with great honour, offered enormous gifts in gold and silver to St. Peter, and obtained from pope John the freedom of the school of the Angles.

A. D. 1032. The church of St. Edmund, king and martyr, was dedicated, in which king Cnut (by the general advice of his bishops and nobles) had placed monks, after having expelled the secular priests. A fire which could scarce be extinguished burnt up many places throughout England. Aelfsige, bishop of Winchester, died, and was succeeded by Aelfwine, the king's priest.

A. D. 1033. Leofsi, a man of great religion, the bishop of the Wiccians, died; his successor was Brithge, abbot of Persore.

A. D. 1034. Malcolm, the king of the Scots, died, and his nephew, Dunecan, succeeded him.

A. D. 1035. Before his death, Cnut, the king of the Angles, appointed his son Suane as king over the Norwegians; over the Danes he placed Hardecnut as king (he was the son of queen Emma), and over the English he placed Harold, who was his son by Aelgiva of Hampshire; and having done this, he died, on the second of the ides of November [12th Nov.], at Shaftesbury, and was buried in the Old Monastery at Winchester, with due honour. But not long afterwards the kingdom of England was divided between Harold and Hardecnut. Rodbert, duke of the Normans, died, and was succeeded by his son, William the Bastard, then a youth.

A. D. 1036. The innocent ethelings, Alwred and Aedward, the sons of king Aegelred, came to England from their uncle Richard, that they might have some conversation with their mother. Some of their companions earl Godwin put in chains, and afterwards blinded them; he tortured some by tearing off the skin from their heads, some he maimed by cutting off their hands and feet, he sold many as slaves, and six hundred of them he put to several kinds of miserable deaths, at Gelgdeford [Guilford]. Having obtained possession of Alfred by treachery, he commanded his eyes to be plucked out at Ely, shortly after which he died. Hereupon Edward returned into Normandy with all speed. Rodbert, the king of the Franks, the son of Hugh, died a holy death, and was succeeded by his son, Henry.

A. D. 1037. Harold, king of the Mercians and Northumbrians, was elected to reign over the whole of England by the nobility and people, who passed over his brother, Hardecnut, because he spent too much of his time in Denmark. Emma, who had formerly been queen, being cruelly expelled from England, was honourably received by Aldwin, earl of Flanders.

A. D. 1038. Aegelnoth, [arch]bishop of Canterbury, died; on the seventh day after whose death, Agelric, bishop of the South Saxons, also departed, having prayed of the Lord that he might not long survive such a father. Edsi, the king's chaplain, succeeded to the archbishopric of Canterbury, Grimketel to the bishopric of the South Saxons. Brithæg, bishop of Worcester, died, and was succeeded by Living.

A. D. 1039. The winter was exceedingly severe. Brithmar, bishop of Lichfield, died, and was succeeded by Wulsi. Hardecnut, king of the Danes, went to Flanders, to visit his mother, Emma. Dunecan, king of the Scots, died, and Macbet usurped his kingdom.

A. D. 1040. King Harold died at London, and was buried at Westminster. Hardecnut, having been elevated to the throne, bitterly revenged upon his dead brother the murder of his brother Alfred. For having disinterred the body of the dead king Harold, he commanded that his head should be first thrown into a ditch, and afterwards cast into the river Thames. Godwin made his peace with the king by offering many gifts, and by the oaths which were sworn by himself and many of his nobles.

A. D. 1041. Edward, the son of Agelred, formerly king of the English, came to England out of Normandy, in which he had resided for many years in exile, and was honourably received by his brother Hardecnut, in whose court he remained.

A. D. 1042. While king Hardecnut (at that time joyful, merry, and in robust health) was celebrating the nuptial festival upon the marriage of Githa, the daughter of Osgot Clappa, a personage of great importance, with Tovi Pruda, a Dane of considerable influence, which was held at the place called Lamhythe, and after having given the bride to the bridegroom, he was standing in company with her and several others, he suddenly fell to the ground as they were drinking; and having remained speechless until the fourth¹ day, he then died, it being the sixth of the ides of June [8th June], and was buried at Winchester, near his father.

A. D. 1043. Edward was anointed king at Winchester, on the first day of Easter, on the third of the nones of April [3d April], by Edsi, archbishop of Canterbury, and Alfrie, archbishop of York, and nearly all the bishops of England. Edmund, bishop of Durham, died, and was succeeded by Aegelric, while Siward directed the earldom of Northumberland.

A. D. 1044. Alwerd, bishop of London, died.

A. D. 1045. Brithwald, bishop of Wilton, died; his successor was Hermann, the king's chaplain.

A. D. 1046. Magnus, king of the Norwegians, the son of the saintly king Olave, having put to flight Swane, the king of the Danes, subjugated Denmark. Osgot Clappa was expelled from England.

A. D. 1047. There was a battle at Wallundun. Alwin, bishop of Winchester, died, and was succeeded by Stigand. Magnus, king of the Norwegians, fought a battle with Swane, and drove him from Denmark, in which he himself reigned, but he died not long after.

A. D. 1048. Suane received Denmark, and Harold Harfahger, the son of Siward, king of the Norwegians (by his mother's side the brother of St. Olave, being the uncle of king Magnus), returned to Norway, and by his messengers made peace with the king of England. There was a great earthquake on the kalends of May [1st May], at Worcester, Wic, Derby, and many other places. A great mortality of men and cattle followed, and fire in the air, commonly called "wood¹ fire," in certain places consumed many towns, and much corn.

A. D. 1049. Leo became the one hundred and forty-fifth pope; this is the Leo who made a new anthem concerning pope Gregory. The emperor Henry collected a countless army against Baldwin, earl of Flanders, because he had broken into and burnt down his very beautiful palace at Neomagium. Pope Leo, and a large number of nobles from different countries, took a part in this expedition. Swane, king of the Danes, accompanied them with his fleet, and he swore fealty to the emperor. At length earl Baldwin was constrained to make peace with the emperor. Pope Leo dedicated the church of St. Remigius at Rheims, where also he afterwards held a council.

A. D. 1050. Macbeth, king of the Scots, distributed (or rather scattered) money at Rome. Edsi, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by Rodbert, bishop of London, a Norman by family. Hermann, bishop of Wilton, [and] Aldred, bishop of Worcester, went to Rome.

A. D. 1051. Alfric, named also Putta, archbishop of York, died at Sudwelle, and was buried at Medeshamstede, that is, at Peterborough; he was succeeded by Kinsi, the king's chaplain. King Edward freed the English from the oppressive tribute of thirty thousand pounds, in the thirty-eighth year after his father, king Aegelred, had first commanded it to be paid to the Danes. A dispute arose between the king and earl Godwin, because he would not give up to death his brother-in-law, the earl of Boulogne, whose retainers (in their ill-advised search for lodgings at Dover, where they had landed) had killed many of the inhabitants, and who had taken refuge in the castle of Dover along with his people. At last the king banished earl Godwine, as he was endeavouring to escape the day which had been appointed, and his five sons with him; the earl had wished to discuss the matter with the king, against whom he had twice marched with his army, and from whom he had twice contrived to escape. King Edward received with great honour earl William the Bastard, of Normandy, who came to him into

England: and after having loaded him with many gifts, he sent him home to his own land.

A. D. 1052. Emma, called also Elgiva, formerly queen of the English, died at Winchester. King Edward restored earl Godwin and his sons to their former dignities, and they were mutually reconciled. Almost all the Normans were banished from England. Rodbert, archbishop of Canterbury, and his friends, escaped, but had great difficulty in getting out of England.

A. D. 1053. The head of Res, the brother of Griffin, the king of the Welsh,¹ was brought to king Edward at Gloucester, in the vigil of the Epiphany [5th Jan.]. Earl Godwin, while he was sitting at table near the king, on the second day of Easter-week [12th April], was struck dumb, and continuing in this condition, was carried out by his sons to the king's chamber, and on the fifth day² afterwards he died, and was succeeded in the earldom by his son Harold, and Harold's earldom was given to Algar, the son of earl Leofric.

A. D. 1054. Siward, the duke of the Northumbrians, entered Scotland with a great army, by the command of king Edward, and having fought a battle with Macbeth, the king of the Scots, he put him to flight, and (as the king had directed) elevated Malcolm³ to the throne. King Edward sent Aldred, bishop of Worcester, to the emperor, that he might receive from him his cousin Edward, who had been in exile in Hungary.

A. D. 1055. Siward, duke of the Northumbrians, died at York; his dukedom was given to Tosti, the brother of earl Harold. Not long after this, Algar, the son of earl Leofric, though innocent, was banished by king Edward, and forthwith went to Ireland, where he procured eighteen piratical vessels; and relying principally upon the assistance of Griffin, the king of the Welsh, he at length recovered his earldom, but not before he had burnt the city of Hereford and the monastery of St. Albert the king and martyr, and had put to death several canons and more than four hundred of the laity.

A. D. 1056. The emperor Henry died, and was succeeded by his son Henry. Edelstan, bishop of Hereford, of holy memory, died, and was succeeded by Levegar, the chaplain of duke Harold; who, along with his clerics and many others, was killed that same year, by Griffin, the king of the Welsh. Agelric, bishop of Durham, voluntarily relinquished his see, and returned to his monastery of Peterborough, where he finished his life. His brother Agelwin succeeded him. Malcolm, the son of Duncan, succeeded to the kingdom of Scotland by hereditary right [⁴and reigned thirty-eight years. In the year one thousand and sixty-seven he married the glorious queen Margaret, who bore him six sons, that is to say,

² He died upon May 15, according to the Saxon Chronicle.

⁴ The portion here inclosed within brackets, is printed from a leaf which has originally formed no part of the Chronicle, but which is written in a hand very little later. The words from "Malcolm" to "right," form all the original text of the Chronicle, which immediately passes into the year following. Subsequent notes will show that this addition varies in some instances from the text itself.

Edward, Edmund, Eddred, Edgar, Alexander, and David, and two daughters, Matilda, the queen of the English, and Mary, countess of Boulogne. In the thirty-seventh year of his reign he was killed in England, on the ides of November [13th Nov. 1093], and his eldest son, Edward, was pierced with a lance at the same place, and died on the seventeenth of the kalends of December [15th Nov. 1093]. As soon as the blessed queen M[argaret] heard this, or rather, (to speak more accurately,) as soon as she had foreknown it by the Holy Spirit, she received confession and the communion, and having recommended her soul by prayer to God, she yielded up her pure spirit to heaven, on the sixteenth of the kalends of December [16th Nov. 1093]. Thereupon Duvenald, the brother of the king Malcolm, whom we have already mentioned, seized upon the throne, and banished the legitimate heirs, namely, Edgar, Alexander, and David. Duncan, however, the son of this Malcolm,—although a base son,—who had been a hostage at the court of the king of England, that is to say, of William Rufus, made a descent, under the assistance and advice of the same monarch; and having put his uncle to flight, was accepted as king, and reigned for one year and a half, but was wickedly slain by a certain nobleman (the earl of Mornes ¹), at the instigation of the Duvenald who has been already mentioned. Hereupon Duvenald once more invaded the kingdom, and reigned for three years and a half. In the year one thousand and ninety-six from the incarnation of our Lord, Edgar, the son of king Malcolm and the glorious queen Margaret, became king of Scotland by hereditary right, Duvenald having been captured and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. And thus king Edgar reigned happily for nine years, and departed in the year one thousand one hundred and seven from the incarnation, on the seventh of the ides of January [7th Jan.]. His brother Alexander succeeded him in the throne, and reigned gloriously for seventeen years, and went the way of all flesh on the sixth of the kalends of May [26th April], in the year one thousand one hundred and twenty-four from our Lord's incarnation. He was succeeded in the throne by his younger and happier brother David. This most powerful king reigned happily for twenty-nine years, and then resigning his soul to God, he departed in the year one thousand one hundred and fifty-three from the incarnation of our Lord, namely, on the ninth of the kalends of June [24th May]. Earl Henry, the son of this king David, had died in the previous year, that is, in the year one thousand one hundred and fifty-two from our Lord's incarnation; and in the following year, I mean, in the year A. D. one thousand one hundred and fifty-four, Malcolm, the son of the aforesaid earl Henry, assumed the government of the realm, being then a boy and a virgin, and by the suggestion of God's grace he continued in his virginity even till his death. He reigned for twelve years and a half, and casting aside the body, he was removed into heaven on the fifth of the ides of December [8th Dec.]. In the same year, that is, in the year one thousand one hundred and sixty-five from our Lord's incarnation, his brother William assumed the rule, and in the thirty-third year of his reign, and in the year one thousand one hundred and ninety-eight from our Lord's incarnation, his son Alexander was born; and this king died in the forty-ninth year of his reign. Adding the one hundred and sixty-six years of the text to that date, we arrive at the year 1164, which brings us to within a year of the death of Malcolm IV. It seems not improbable therefore that this present entry is intended to be taken in connexion with that event.

As the symptoms grew more severe, he became aware that the day of his death was at hand, whereupon he gave their liberty to his brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, and the earls Morkar and Roger, and Siward, surnamed Barn, and Wulnot the treasurer of king Harold (whom he had kept under ward even from his boyhood), and all the persons whom he had in confinement, either in England or in Normandy. Then he gave the kingdom of England to his son William, and the earldom of Normandy to his eldest son Robert, who at that time was an exile in France; and thus, after having armed himself with the heavenly viaticum, he resigned at once his kingdom and his life, on the fifth of the ides of September [9th Sept.], after having reigned over the English for twenty years and eleven months. He was buried at Caen, in the church of St. Stephen, which he had built from the foundation, and had richly endowed. A. D. 1132.² On the third of the nones of March [5th March] the abbey of St. Mary of Rievax was completed, it being Saturday, and its first abbot was William.

A. D. 1133. There was an eclipse of the sun on the fourth of the nones of August [2d. Aug.], on the fourth day of the week [Wednesday], so that for some time the day was turned into night. Geoffrey, the king's chancellor, was consecrated bishop of Durham, and Aldulf was consecrated bishop of Carlisle by Turstin, archbishop of York. Nigell³ was consecrated bishop of Ely.

A. D. 1134. The church of St. James of Rokesburch was dedicated on the fifteenth of the kalends of May [17th April], being the third day in Easter week; and the church of St. Paul at London was destroyed by fire. Malcolm⁴ was captured, and placed in close custody in the tower of Rokesburch. Robert Curthose died in prison.

A. D. 1135. Henry, king of England, died on the fourth of the nones of December [2d Dec.], and earl Stephen, his nephew, assumed the government; afterwards he was crowned, on the eleventh of the kalends of January [22d Dec.], and on the day of his coronation the pax was forgotten to be offered to the people, nor had he peace for nearly all the days of his life.

A. D. 1136.⁵ The abbey of St. Mary of Melrose was finished on Monday, being the second day of Easter week [23d March], and its first abbot was Richard. William, archbishop of Canterbury, died. The church of Glasgow was dedicated. Northumberland and Cumberland were surrendered to David, the king of the Scots; but king David and king Stephen having been reconciled shortly afterwards, Northumberland was restored to king Stephen, while Cumberland remained with king David. The translation of St. Guthlac the confessor.

A. D. 1137. Louis the Fat, the king of France, died; his son Louis succeeded him. Turstin, archbishop of York, came to Rochesburc, and obtained from king David the promise that he would not again devastate Northumberland. Shortly afterwards, however, the truce was broken because king Stephen would not give Northumberland to Henry, the son of king David.

A. D. 1138. King David miserably devastated the whole of Northumberland. In the beginning of Lent [16th Feb.], king Stephen came with a great army to Rokesburc, but shortly afterwards returned with disgrace. Petrus Leo, the antipope, died. The legate Albert,¹ the bishop of Ostia, came to Carlisle to king David. There was a battle at the Standard at Cuttenemor between the Scots and the English, on the eleventh of the kalends of September [22d Aug.], being the second day of the week [Monday], and the bishop of Salisbury, and the bishop of Lincoln, who was chancellor, were taken prisoners by king Stephen.

A. D. 1139. Teodbald, abbot of Bec, was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, by Alberic the legate, about the Epiphany of our Lord [6th Jan.]. At the instance of the queen peace was made between the two kings, and Northumberland was given to Henry, the son of king David. Earl Henry married the countess Ada, the daughter of William, earl of Warren, [² and the sister of William the younger,] and of Robert, earl of Leicester, and of Waleran, count of Mellent, whose mother was sister of Ralph, earl of Perona, the kinswoman of the king of France. Henry, bishop of Winchester, the brother of king Stephen, was made legate of England by pope Innocent. The empress Matilda came into England to obtain possession of the land for the benefit of her son, whom king David, and many others, considered to be the lawful heir.

A. D. 1140. King Stephen was taken prisoner at Lincoln in battle on the day of the Purification of St. Mary [2d Feb.], and committed to prison. At the festival of the Holy Cross in September [14th Sept.], a numerous army was levied from England, and the parts beyond the sea, and at the instance of his queen, Stephen was entirely restored to his liberty, and received the kingdom, and he was exchanged for Robert, earl of Gloucester, the son of king Henry, who had been taken prisoner there,³ and David, king of the Scots, and the empress escaped in safety. The abbey of St. Mary of Newbottle⁴ was built. Turstin, archbishop of York, died; he had spent the latter part of his days in the monastery of St. John the Evangelist at Punfreit.

A. D. 1141. An eclipse of the sun took place on the fourteenth of the kalends of April [20th Mar.], and king Malcolm was born.⁵ Alberic de Ver was killed at London, in a tumult of the citizens. Geoffrey, bishop of Durham, died. William the treasurer was elected archbishop of York.

A. D. 1142. William Cumin, the chancellor of David, king of the Scots, at the instigation of the empress, entered the castle of Durham, and held the possessions of St. Cuthbert by force for some time; for, in the blindness of his ambition, he wished to become the bishop of that see. The church, being thus grievously oppressed, Roger the prior and Ralph the archdeacon abandoned the place, and the others were scattered, and there were no divine services in the church. In⁶ the same year the abbey of Dundraynan, in Galloway, was founded.

⁶ In a hand somewhat later.

A. D. 1143. William de Sancta Barbara, dean of the church of York, was elected bishop of Durham. These two Williams were both consecrated by Henry, bishop of Winchester, the legate of the Roman church; the aforesaid treasurer William became archbishop of York, dean William became bishop of Durham. Pope Innocent died; his successor was Celestine. The order of the Premonstratensians came to Neus.¹ William,² king of Scotland, was born.

A. D. 1144. Pope Celestine died, and was succeeded by Lucius.

A. D. 1145. William, abbot of Rievalx, died; he was succeeded by Maurice. Pope Lucius died; he was succeeded by Eugenius. The noble city of Edessa, in Messapotamia of Syria, which is now called Roëisa, was taken by treachery on the night of the Nativity of our Lord [25th Dec.], while the people were engaged in divine service, the archbishop being cruelly beheaded by the Saracens, while he was in the church, as was also the greater part of the Christian population. In this city rests St. Thomas the Apostle, having been some time before translated thither from India.

A. D. 1146. The church of St. Mary of Malros was dedicated upon the fifth of the kalends of August [28th July], being Sunday. Archbishop William was accused³ in the Roman court by certain persons of his own diocese, and grave charges were preferred against him. And because the bishop of Durham would not purge him by oath, pope Eugenius commanded him to cease [from the discharge of his functions].

A. D. 1147. Louis, king of France, and many nobles, and a countless number of people, set out for Jerusalem, to wage war against the Saracens; but not only did they profit nothing, but in many places they sustained considerable loss, and the noble William, earl of Warren, was captured by the Turks. The Premonstratensian order came to Alnwick.⁴ John, bishop of Glasgow, died,⁵ and Hubert, abbot of Kelso, succeeded him, having been consecrated at Auxerre, by pope Eugenius, on St. Bartholomew's day [24th Aug.]. Ernald became the second abbot of Kelso. Henry Murdac, abbot of Fountains, was elected to the archbishopric of York, and was consecrated by pope Eugenius at Treves, on the second Sunday of the Lord's Advent [7th Dec.]. Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, died. In the same year pope Eugenius held a great council at Rheims, upon the festival named "Lætare⁶ Jerusalem."

A. D. 1148. Richard, the first abbot of Melrose, died, and Walteve, the brother of Henry earl of Northumberland and of Simon earl of Northampton, was made abbot of Melrose. The convent came to Alnwick. Robert, the venerable bishop of Hereford, died, and was succeeded by Girard. The city of Lisbon was taken by the Christians. St. Malachi, an Irish bishop, died at Clairvaulx, and was buried there.

A. D. 1149. Richard, formerly abbot of Melrose, died in the convent at Clairvaulx. Henry, the son of the empress¹ the daughter of king Henry the first, and the son of the earl of Anjou, was honourably received by David the king of the Scots at Carlisle, and there received arms of knighthood from him. Louis, the king of the Franks, returned from Jerusalem.

A. D. 1150. The abbey of Holmculture² was built on the kalends of January [1st Jan.], and Everard was its first abbot; as also the abbey of Kinlos, in Muref, on the twelfth of the kalends of June [21st May], and its first abbot was Asceline. The Premonstratensian order came to Drueburgh, on the festival of St. Martin [10th Nov.].

A. D. 1151. Pope Eugenius sent four palls into Ireland (where hitherto no pall had ever been sent), by his legate, John Papius. Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, died, and his son Henry succeeded him. The Premonstratensian order came to Kikemunt.³

A. D. 1152. Matilda, queen of the English, died. Henry, earl of Northumberland, the son of David, king of Scots, died, as did also his daughter Matilda. Baldwin, the first abbot of Alnwick, died; his successor was Patrick. William, bishop of Durham, died. The convent came to Drieburc on the day of St. Lucy [13th Dec.], and Roger became its first abbot.

A. D. 1153. David, king of Scots, died on the ninth of the kalends of June [24th May], and his grandson, Malcolm, a boy of twelve years of age (the son of earl Henry, king David's son), succeeded him. Pope Eugenius died; his successor was Anastasius. Henry, archbishop of York, died, likewise Bernard, abbot of Clairvaulx. Peace was restored to England, for king Stephen, and Henry, duke of Normandy, were reconciled with each other. By the mediation of the venerable men, Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, and Henry, bishop of Winchester, Stephen adopted Henry as his son, appointed that he should be his heir, and his successor in the realm. Hugh, the treasurer of York, the king's kinsman, was consecrated by pope Anastasius as bishop of Durham, on the Sunday before Christmas-day [20th Dec.].

A. D. 1154. Eustace, the king's son, died; and then king Stephen himself, and he was succeeded by Henry, duke of Normandy, the son of Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, and of the empress; and he was crowned on the Sunday before Easter-day [19th Dec.]. William, formerly archbishop of York, whom pope Eugenius had suspended, having gone to Rome in the previous year, obtained the favour of pope Anastasius, and in the course of the present year was honourably restored to his see. Not long after this, however, a conspiracy was formed against him (report says, by his own clergy), and, after having partaken of the eucharist,¹ he died, while engaged in washing himself; ² the wine having been poisoned. Roger, archdeacon of Canterbury, succeeded him.

A. D. 1155. Pope Anastasius died; his successor was Adrian.

A. D. 1156. A convent of nuns came to Eccles³ for the second time. Dovenald, the son of Malcol[m], was captured at Witern, and imprisoned in the tower at Rokesburc,⁴ along with his father.

A. D. 1157. Malcolm, king of the Scots, went to Henry, king of England, at Chester, and there became his vassal, upon the same terms as his grandfather had been the vassal of the old king Henry, preserving in every respect his dignities. King Henry marched his army for the first time into Wales, and took Rueland.

A. D. 1158. The castle of Werc was fortified for the second time at the command of the king of England.

There was a meeting at Carlel, between Henry, king of England, and Malcolm, king of the Scots; but they parted from each other not upon the best of terms, and therefore the king of Scots was not made a knight at that time.

A. D. 1159. Robert, bishop of St. Andrew's, died. Waldeve of pious memory, the second abbot of Malros, died on the third of the nones of August [3d Aug.]; he was the uncle of king M[alcolm]. His successor was William, a monk of the same church, on the fifth of the kalends of December, and he received the benediction in our church on the vigil of St. Andrew the Apostle [29th Nov.] (which fell on a Sunday), from Herbert, bishop of Glasgow. Pope Adrian died on the kalends of September [1st Sept.], and he was succeeded by Alexander, who was canonically elected and consecrated. The emperor Frederic, however, set up for himself an idol—I mean, the antipope Octavian; and he and his people, by an accursed council and a bloody conventicle holden at Pavia, decreed that this person should be worshipped. And thus a schism arose in the church, and continued for no short time. Henry, king of England, went to Tolouse with his army, and many died in the expedition. William, earl of Bolougne, the son of king Stephen, and Hamo, the son of the earl of Gloucester, deceased. On his return from this army, Malcolm, the king of the Scots, was made a knight, at Tours, by Henry, king of England. William, bishop of Moray, and Nicolas, at that time the chamberlain of the king of the Scots, paying a visit to the Roman court, on the service of king Malcolm, of their own free will went to see pope Alexander, at Agnania, which is beyond Rome. They were received by him with due honour. William returned in the year following, having been appointed the legate for the kingdom of Scotland. William, bishop of St. Andrew's, died.

A. D. 1160. William, king of Scotland, returned from the expedition to Tolouse; and having reached the town called Perth, he was besieged therein by earl Fereteatht¹ and five other earls, who were incensed against him because he had gone to Toulouse, and who wished, therefore, to take him prisoner. This presumptuous design of theirs was unsuccessful. Upon three several occasions, king Malcolm went with a large army into Galloway, and at length he subdued them. Ernald, abbot of Kelso, was elected to the episcopal see of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, upon the day of St. Brice, the bishop [13th Nov.], (which this year fell upon a Sunday); and on the Sunday following, that is to say, on the day of St. Edmund [20th Nov.], he was consecrated at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, by William, bishop of Moray, the legate of the apostolic see, in the presence of king Malcolm, and the bishops and abbots and earls of the realm. He was succeeded by John, the chanter of the same church, who was elected on the vigil of St. Andrew [29th Nov.]; and on the day of the Epiphany [6th Jan.], he received the benediction from Herbert, bishop of Glasgow. This year king Malcolm gave his sister Margaret to Conan, duke of Brittany, in marriage. Robert, prior of St. Andrew's, died; his successor was Walter, the chanter of the same church.

A. D. 1161. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, died; he was the legate of the church of Rome. The venerable Thomas, the chancellor of the king of England and archdeacon of the church of Canterbury, that most admirable defender of the holy church of God, then succeeded. He was a thorough despiser of the world, though taken from the palace, and wearing the secular habit. Bishop Ernald was made legate of the kingdom of Scotland, by pope Alexander. While exercising his legative functions, he consecrated Gregory bishop of Rosmark; but afterwards, at the command of pope Alexander, he ceased from the discharge of his office. William, bishop of Murray, died.

A. D. 1162. Hugh de Moreville, the founder of the church of Driebug, died. Malcolm, king of Scotland, gave his second sister Ada to Florence, earl of Hoilande. Henry, king of England, received with distinction pope Alexander, when on his journey to France. Ernald, bishop of St. Andrew's, died. The church of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, was founded.

A. D. 1163. Henry, king of England, returned home from the parts beyond the sea. Richard, the chaplain of king Malcolm, was elected to the bishopric of St. Andrew's; and, by God's mercy, king Malcolm recovered at Danecastre [Doncaster]² from a severe illness, and a firm peace was established between him and Henry, king of England. Pope Alexander the third held a general council at the city of Tours, in which he excommunicated the antipope Octovian and the other schismatics, with the sole exception of the emperor.

A. D. 1164. The abbey of Cupre was built by king Malcolm. William, the brother of king Henry, died. The antipope Octovian died, and the schismatical emperor already mentioned appointed a second antipope, Wido of Crema. Sumerled, the under-king of Eregeithel [Argyll], who had been in a state of wicked rebellion for twelve years against his natural lord, Malcolm, king of Scotland, landed at Renfriū, with a large army which he had collected together in Ireland and various other places; but at length God's vengeance overtook him, and he and his son,¹ and a countless number of his followers, were there slain by a few of the people of that district. Herbert, bishop of Glasgow, died, and was succeeded by Engelram, the king's chancellor, who was consecrated by pope Alexander at the city of Sens, on the day of the apostles St. Simon and St. Jude [28th Oct.], although the messengers of the archbishop of York² strongly opposed this. The venerable Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, retired from England, in consequence of the intolerable injuries which had been inflicted upon the holy church . . .³ by the king of England. The archbishop of York came to Norham, to exercise his legative office through Scotland; but the messengers of the king of Scotland resisted him, and opposed his legative office, whereupon he returned in confusion.

A.D. 1165. Richard, the chaplain of king Malcolm, was consecrated at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, by the . . .⁴ bishops of that realm, upon Palm Sunday, which this year fell upon the fifth of the kalends of April [28th March]. And Henry, king of England, passed the sea; and, after his return, he marched into Wales with a great army, where he slew many people, and executed justice upon the two sons of king Ris, and upon the sons and daughters of his nobles: he put out the eyes of the boys, and cut off the ears and noses of the girls. In the month of August, two comets appeared before sunrise, one in the south and the other in the north. A comet is a star which is not always visible, but which appears most frequently upon the death of a king, or on the destruction of a kingdom. When it appears with a crown of shining rays, it portends the decease of a king; but if it has streaming hair, and throws it off, as it were, then it betokens the ruin of the country. There was a great tempest in the province of York during that same month. Many people saw the old enemy taking the lead in that tempest; he was in the form of a black horse of large size, and always kept hurrying towards the sea, while he was followed by thunder and lightning, and fearful noises and a destructive hail. The footprints of this accursed horse were of a very enormous size, especially on the hill near the town of Scardeburgh, from which he gave a leap into the sea; and here, for a whole year afterwards, they were plainly visible, the impression of each foot being deeply graven in the earth. The same tempest destroyed a mill on the river Severn, with its inhabitants, with the exception of a single monk, who, by God's mercy, was saved from the fire; but as a token that God makes a difference among men, to give hope to unwavering consolation, and chiefly for the praise of the Omnipotent, this monk and his property escaped uninjured.

Pope Alexander returned from France to Rome, where he was received with great honour, and accepted by nearly the whole of Italy and Tuscany, and by the Milanese, although those who were in schism rejected his authority. Malcolm, the king of Scotland, of pious memory, died at Gedeworth, on the fifth of the ides of December [9th Dec.], which fell upon the fifth day of the week; he was in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and in the twelfth¹ of his reign. His corpse was carried to Dunfermelin by all the people, with much honour, and there it was buried. William, his brother, succeeded him; and on the vigil of the Lord's Nativity [24th Dec.] he was elevated to the throne, according to the kingly manner. The Premonstratensian order came to Blanchelande.² John, abbot of Kelso, came from Rome, a mitred abbot.

A. D. 1166. Henry, king of England, passed the sea, and was followed by William, king of Scotland, the business of his lord so requiring it; but he returned ere long, after some military exploits had been attempted. Earl Gospatric³ died; his son Waldeve succeeded him.

A. D. 1167. Aldred of pious memory, the third abbot of Rievaulx, died; he was succeeded by Silvanus, abbot of Dundrainan. Robert de Melun, the venerable bishop of Hereford, died; he was succeeded by Robert de Foliot. Patric, the second abbot of Alnewic, died; Richard, the prior of the same place, succeeded him. The empress Matilda, the mother of Henry the Second, the king of England, died. The emperor Henry came in hostile manner to Rome, to assist the party of Wido of Crema, the second antipope; and the one schismatic helping the other, Wido was intruded into the church of St. Peter by violence and force of arms. But as he and his army were returning home, a deadly pestilence broke out among his people, and killed some of the principal of them. The elect of Cologne, who was the head of the whole schism, died while among the Alps; and in order that his bones might be separated from the flesh, and that he might be removed to Cologne, the whole body was boiled in water. For those leading men of his who had been elected, but were not bishops, desired to have the reliques of one whom they considered to be honourable, but whom we hold to be a dishonoured person and an impostor.

A. D. 1168. Gilbert⁴ of pious memory, the abbot of Citeaux, died, and he was succeeded by Alexander, its tenth abbot. The schismatical Wido, the second antipope, died; then there was raised up a third antipope, whose name is unknown, and which may continue in obscurity. Robert, the good earl of Leicester, died; he was called the Chief Justice.

A. D. 1169. Gregory, bishop of Dunkeld, died, and was succeeded by Richard, the king's chaplain. By the king's orders, a vile and abominable conspiracy was formed throughout almost the whole of England against our lord the pope Alexander, and the venerable archbishop Thomas, at this time an exile in France. Hunbaud, the prior of Wenelec, brought the convent to Passelet [Paisley],¹ which is near Renfri.

A. D. 1170. Henry, king of England, returned home from Normandy, and on the passage many perished by shipwreck. William, the third abbot of Maylrose, humbly laid down his pastoral office on the tenth of the kalends of May [22d April]; and, on the same day, Josceline the prior succeeded him. William, king of the Scots, went to Windlesoure [Windsor], to visit king Henry. His brother David was made a knight, on the octaves of Pentecost [31st May], by the king of England. Henry, king of England, caused his youthful son Henry to be crowned; and on Sunday, the eleventh of the kalends of June [22d May], he was consecrated king by Roger, the usurping archbishop of York, who, contrary to the canons, had taken upon himself to exercise, in another province, functions and rights which did not belong to him; and this he did out of the king's tyranny as well as his own, although the venerable Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was still alive, and in banishment in France. On the festival of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul [29th June], a great and terrible earthquake suddenly occurred in the east, beyond the Greek sea, where it overwhelmed many cities and towns, along with their inhabitants, such as Tripolis, Gibellum, Laodicea, Antioch, and numerous others; but the land of the infidels suffered still more severely, and a countless number of them perished by the same earthquake. Richard, the chaplain of king William, was consecrated bishop of Dunkeld, on the vigil of St. Laurence [9th Aug.], by Richard, bishop of St. Andrew's, in the cathedral church of St. Andrew's. Godric, the venerable hermit of Finchale, near Durham, died. Richard, earl of Pembrok, the son of Gilbert earl Stranbohe, the son of Isabel, the aunt of Malcolm and William, kings of Scotland, and of David, the earl of good hope, with a great retinue of knights and sturdy men, passed over into Ireland; and, having been supported by the assistance of a certain petty king of that land (whose daughter he had married), he boldly stormed certain towns, along with the principal city of that country, that is to say, Dublin; and at length obtained possession of it. Oswin, the sub-king of Wales, died. Thomas, the venerable archbishop of Canterbury, having now been appointed legate by pope Alexander, returned into England, by the king's permission, about the feast of St. Andrew's [30th Nov.]. Pope Alexander suspended Roger, archbishop of York, from every episcopal function; as also Hugh, bishop of Durham, and Gilbert, bishop of London; and, indeed, all those who had been present at the uncanonical coronation of Henry, the king's son.

A. D. 1171. Alas! what accursed wickedness, what a detestable crime, what a horrible deed, what an unheard-of guilt! Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, of blessed memory, the legate of the apostolic see, the primate of all England, had now been struggling for six years and longer for justice, and had been exiled into France by reason of the violence of the elder Henry, king of England, and had there endured innumerable injuries for the sake of Christ's church; for all who were connected with him, according to the flesh, young and old, even to the infant who hung at the breast, had been expelled from England by the most unjust command of the king. At length, however, peace was fully confirmed between the king and his archbishop, as it was thought, chiefly through the instrumentality of our lord the pope and the court of Rome, and of the French church, and chiefly of the religious king of France, Louis: and so the archbishop was admitted by the king to the kiss of peace, and permitted to depart into England with the king's letters. But a few days after he had been restored to his see, the king's anger was so hot against him—chiefly because, as we have said, he had been entrusted by our lord the pope with the office of legate, and because he had suspended the bishops—as to resemble, and at the same time to surpass, that fury exhibited by the one Herod against our Lord, and the other against John the Baptist, that he was murdered against all right and justice, by the intimate friends of the king, those most wicked barons and accursed knights. This occurred in the cathedral church of the whole of England, in the church of the Holy Trinity, before the holy altar of the blessed Benedict, and in the presence of countless martyrs, confessors, and virgins, whose reliques surrounded him everywhere in that fabric; and so he passed to his reward on the fifth day after the Nativity of our Lord [29th Dec.], just as St. Thomas the apostle has his festival five days before that same Nativity, on the day following the Nativity of the Innocents, with whom he is to be associated in the other life. Imitating our Lord, he prayed for his murderers, while the right hand of one of his clergy, who bore his cross, was nearly cut off. And then, alas! was this true martyr of Christ put to death, the punishment due to the shedding of whose blood was inflicted upon all those who had any share in the murder—primarily upon those who were the active perpetrators, and in a secondary degree upon all who assisted in it, or consented to it, or had any knowledge of it before its commission; and all these discovered how that the sword of the Lord is a speedy avenger, and the Highest will repay it.

Nicolas, the chancellor of the king of the Scots, died. Conan, duke of Brittany and earl of Richmond, died. Ferchet, earl of Strathern, died. The sea seemed, to many people in England, to be a fire. Ralph, monk of Meylros, was chosen father of Cupre, and received the benediction as abbot from Richard, bishop of St. Andrew's, on the Purification of the blessed Virgin [2d Feb.], at Coldingham. The tomb of an holy father, the lord Wallef, the second abbot of Melros, was opened by Ingram, bishop of Glasgow, of good memory, and by four abbots, who had been invited for the purpose, and the body was discovered to be entire, and the vestments unchanged. This occurred on the eleventh of the kalends of June [22d May], in the twelfth year after his decease. And after the holy solemnities of masses, the same bishops and abbots whom we have mentioned, along with all the inmates of the monastery, placed a new stone of polished marble upon the remains of that most holy body. And there was much rejoicing, and all who were present raised their voices and said, "Truly this was a man of God." Pontius,¹ abbot of Clairvaux, of holy memory, was elected to the bishopric of Clairmont; and so this pastor was translated and elevated from the valley to the hill, from Clairvaux to Clairmont, from one degree of brightness to another, as by the Spirit of the Lord [2 Cor. iii. 18].

Simon de Tonei, monk of Melrose,² formerly abbot of Coggeshall, was elected to the see of Murray, and conducted thither. Henry, king of England, with a powerful army and in great force, went to Ireland, passing over by sea. Aedward, bishop of Aberdeen, died.

A. D. 1172. There was an exceedingly strong wind on the day of the Holy Innocents [28th Dec.]. The church of Canterbury was reconciled and restored to peace by two cardinals, who had been sent into France. Simon, bishop elect of Moray, received the privilege of consecration³ at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, upon the tenth of the kalends of February [23d Jan.]. Matthew, archdeacon of St. Andrew's, was elected to the bishopric of Aberdeen, and afterwards was consecrated on the fourth of the nones of April [2d April], on the day⁴ of our Lord's passion. Henry, king of England, returned from Ireland after Easter.

A. D. 1173. Pope Alexander the third canonized⁵ the blessed Thomas, the archbishop of Canterbury, on Ash-Wednesday [21st Feb.], at Anagnia, and commanded that his memorial should be inscribed in the catalogue of the saints; and he further enjoined, by his apostolic authority, that the day of his passion should be held and celebrated as a festival. He himself devoutly (as was his custom) sang the first mass to the memory of the martyr, in the presence of an innumerable body of clergy and laity; and he made solemn mention of him in the collect, and in the secret, and in the post-communion. And he who saw and heard beareth witness.

A dispute and a war, which may almost be styled inexorable, arose between the belly and the bowels, between the parent and the child, between Henry the elder and Henry the younger, king of England; and so that the latter (who, though he was a youth, was yet a knight and a king) secretly departed by night, with all speed, to the king of France, his father-in-law, induced to take this step in consequence of some annoyances and injuries which he had experienced at the hands of his father. It is said that he did this by the advice of his mother, but of this we are in ignorance; let her see to it, and let Him judge. The father had intended to capture his son, and to put him in a sure and close place of custody; so at least common report goes. Many noble and powerful individuals, and men well skilled in the art of war, accompanied him, as well from England as from Normandy; and strengthened by their counsel and assistance, the son (we should rather have said the sons) rose against the father; and thus the provinces, as well on this side the sea as those beyond it, being stirred up by wars and rumours of wars, rushed to arms, and prepared for the battle.

Hereupon William, king of the Scots, hoping that he would find a remedy for old injuries in this new strife, waged a fierce war against his kinsman and lord, Henry, king of England, following herein evil counsels. At the head of a very large army, he laid siege to the castle which is called Werc; and having lingered there for some little time, he made no progress. The king proceeded onwards, and the Scots cruelly destroyed the greater part of Northumberland with fire, and with great ferocity put the inhabitants to the sword. They fell back upon Carlisle, and assaulted the city with all their forces; but some people having pretended that the English army was advancing upon them, they speedily took to flight.

Great and unprecedented miracles were performed throughout all England, by the blessed martyr, Thomas, the archbishop. There was a fearful thunderstorm on the seventeenth of the kalends of September [16th Aug.]. A dangerous and unusual cough seized nearly every one far and near; in or after which disease many died. Robert, earl of Leicester, and his wife, were taken prisoners in the territory of St. Edmund's, and placed in the strictest custody. Moreover, a countless multitude of the Flemings left their own country to take possession of England; but they finished their expedition as well as their life in the same spot as the earl. Blessed be God, who cuts off the wicked, that they may not destroy the just!

A. D. 1174. Ingeram, of good memory, the bishop of Glasgow, died, upon the day of the Purification of the blessed Mary [2d Feb.]. Upon the kalends of March [1st March], Ascelin, the first abbot of Kinlos, in Moray, died; and in his place, Reiner, a monk of Melrose, succeeded. Osbert, the first abbot of Jeddeworth, died; his successor was Richard, the cellerar of the same place. Joscelin, the abbot of the monastery of Melrose, the fourth in succession, was chosen bishop of the church of Glasgow, by the clergy, at the request of the people, and by the assent of the king, upon the tenth of the kalends of June [23d May], at Perth, in Scotland. He was a meek man, and well mannered; of a gentle and moderate disposition. William, king of Scotland, sent his army to Alnwick the second time, or rather he conducted it thither; he put to flight many, and many he killed. Amidst these tempests, Henry the elder, the king of England, came to England. Stung to the heart with repentance, and of a contrite spirit, he walked barefoot, clothed in woollen garments; and immediately upon his arrival in his own realm, he visited the sepulchre of the blessed Thomas of Canterbury, attended by a numerous body of bishops and nobles, and there he did penance for his sins, and entreated for reconciliation. On the morrow, William, king of the Scots, was taken prisoner at Alnwick, and conducted (sorrowing as he went) to Richmond, where he was kept in custody for a time, but with all due respect. As soon as the intelligence reached the king of England, by his orders he was sent across into Normandy, and this welcome treasure was laid up in safety in the tower of Falaise. When his younger brother, earl David, was aware of this, he hastily abandoned Leicester, which he was besieging, and he and his followers took themselves back to Scotland as they best might. The blessed Bernard, the first abbot of Clairvaux, was solemnly canonized by our lord the pope, Alexander the third, in the city of Rome; and it was appointed by the apostolic authority that a memorial of him should be inscribed in the catalogue [of the saints].

A. D. 1175. William, king of Scotland, and his people, returned home to their own country. Joceline, the bishop elect of the church of Glasgow, was consecrated bishop by Eskil, archbishop of Lund, the legate of the apostolic see, and the primate of all Denmark, at Clairvaux, at the command of pope Alexander the third. Our monk Laurence, who had formerly been an abbot in Orkney, was elected on the second of the ides of May [14th May]; and on the day following the Ascension of our Lord [21st May], he was honourably blessed as abbot in our church, by Joceline, bishop of Glasgow. The church of Clairvaux was dedicated; and the reliques of St. Bernard, the first abbot of Clairvaux, were translated with honour, and placed within the church with the reverence due to such a holy man. The earls and barons, and all the greater and more powerful personages through the realm of Scotland, did their allegiance to Henry, king of England, in the presence of William, their king, and gave him hostages; and the bishops of the same kingdom swore fealty to him upon the Word of Truth. This was done at York.

A. D. 1176. Wivian, presbyter cardinal by the title of St. Stephen in the Celian mount, the legate of the apostolic see, came into Scotland, treading down and crushing under foot everything in his road; being always ready to receive, and no sluggard in plundering. Earl Richard, surnamed Strangboge, died in Ireland. A dispute arose between Walter, abbot of Tirone, and John, abbot of Kelso, concerning subjection, whether of them should be the greater.

A. D. 1177. Frederic, the emperor of the Romans, returned to the worship of a Christian, and to the unity of holy mother church; and coming to Venice, he both promised and performed due reverence to pope Alexander the third, in the church of St. Mark; and in token of their good faith, and of the firmness of the treaty into which they had entered, they mutually kissed each other. Cardinal Vivian, on his return from Ireland, summoned the prelates of the realm of Scotland to meet him at Edinburgh, and there he sat in the council. Roger, the first abbot of Driburgh, resigned the care of the sheep, and the prior Gerard succeeded him in that office. Walter¹ Fitz-Alan, the steward of the king of Scotland, our intimate friend, died. May his blessed soul live in glory!

A. D. 1178. Richard, bishop of Dunkeld, died, and also Richard, bishop of St. Andrew's. Master John, surnamed the Scot, was elected to the bishopric of St. Andrew's; but king William resisted his election with all his power, and relying upon his kingly authority, he caused his chaplain, Hugh, to be consecrated bishop of the church of St. Andrew's. Hence arose a grievous dispute¹ and a dangerous schism. The sun grew pale at midday, and was nearly obscured upon the ides of September [13th Sept.]. Holland was submerged. The countess Ada died. She was the mother of Malcolm and William, kings of Scotland, and of earl David. Laurence, of pious memory, the fifth abbot of Melrose, died; he was a man of extraordinary humility and gentleness, and well skilled in the scriptures. Geoffrey, abbot of Dunfermelin, died; and Walter² de Bidun, the chancellor of the king of Scots, was elected to the church of Dunkeld.

A. D. 1179. Ernard, the sixth abbot of Melrose, received the blessing from Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, in our church, upon the day of our Lord's epiphany [6th Jan.]. Pope Alexander the third celebrated a great council at Rome, in the church which is called the church of Constantine, upon the "Lætare Hierusalem," which was on the fifth of the ides of March [11th March], in the twentieth year of his pontificate. In the same council Henry,³ abbot of Clairvaux, was elected bishop of the church of Alba; and he was consecrated by our lord pope Alexander, in the church of St. Mary, which is called Narcissa, on the third Sunday after Easter [15th April], on which "Vocem jucunditatis" is sung. Reinald, the first abbot⁴ of St. Thomas the martyr in Scotland, and Adam, the parson of Dunbar, died. There died also Amfrid, the second abbot of Newbottle, on the fourteenth of the kalends of September [19th Aug.]; and Alina, countess of Dunbar, died on the thirteenth of the kalends of September [20th Aug.]. On the day of St. Bartholomew the apostle [24th Aug.] there was a severe storm of thunder and lightning throughout the whole of Helielandeschire. William, king of Scotland, and his brother David, with the earls and barons of the land, and accompanied by a large and powerful army, proceeded to Ros, and there they fortified two castles; the name of the one was Dunscaith, and of the other Etherdover.

A. D. 1180. John, abbot of Kelso, died; Osbert, prior of St. Machutus, succeeded. A great dispute between the house of Melrose and Richard de Moreve, concerning the forest and pasture between the Galge and Ledre, was decided at Haddington, upon mid-Lent Sunday [30th March], in the presence of William, the king of the Scots, and earl David his brother, and before a large body of persons, as well ecclesiastics as laymen; and, by the assistance of God, the justice of their cause gained the suit for the monks upon this occasion; so that by the force of their title-deeds, and by the authority of the privileges granted them by the church of Rome, the property was adjudicated¹ to them. Baldwin, abbot of Ford, a man venerable and to be esteemed from his learning and holiness, was chosen bishop of Worcester, and God regarded his lowliness; for although the excellence of his life placed him far above others, yet his humility alone exalted him in God's sight. He did not value the world—nay, he despised it; nor did he strive after its honours, but disregarded them. Alexis,² a subdeacon of the holy Roman church and the nuncio of the apostolic see, in order that he might know the truth respecting the church of St. Andrew's, came into the kingdom of Scotland, with John the elect [bishop], king William with difficulty assenting thereto. He was the cause of annoyance to many, and he provoked to anger the heart of the king. John, the elect of St. Andrew's, was sent to the court, after having been confirmed by pope Alexander; but out of regard to the dignity of the church of St. Andrew's, and for the king's honour, permission was granted that he might be consecrated in his episcopal see by such bishops as he should choose. But Alexis, after much deliberation and many grievances, and after he had excommunicated some of the king's clerks, and even placed the bishopric of St. Andrew's under interdict, at last caused the aforesaid John to be honourably consecrated bishop in the see which we have mentioned; and this was done by the pope's command, in a large meeting of bishops, abbots, and religious personages, who assembled at Edinburgh, in the church of Holyrood, on the octaves of Pentecost, that is to say, on the sixth of the ides of June [8th³ June], Matthew, bishop of Aberdeen, being the consecrating bishop. But John, when consecrated, finding that he had no see, and being afraid of the king and apprehensive of the anger of the nobles, immediately fled from the province, and sorrowfully betook himself to a place of greater safety.

A. D. 1181. William de⁴ Tulosa, of pious memory, abbot of Citeaux, died, and was succeeded by Peter de Pontiniac. Louis, king of France, being a pious and religious man, despised this evil world, having resigned to his son Philip the realm which he had energetically governed for forty-four years, and afterwards (God directing him) he humbly retired to an abbey of the Cistercian order, called Port, which he himself had founded; and in the same year he happily departed from the body of this death. Matters of business required that William, king of the Scots, and earl David his brother, should go to the parts beyond the sea, to king Henry the elder. In many localities throughout England there were great storms of thunder and lightning, and tempests of wind, and floods of waters. There were done many and great miracles at St. Edmund's, by the blessed youth Robert, whom a Jew had cruelly put to death in secrecy. The like extraordinary occurrences happened at Huntingdon, in regard to another boy named Herbert, whom his own father had cruelly bound to a stake, and miserably drowned in the river which runs near the town. A comet appeared in the month of July. Bishop Joceline enlarged his episcopal residence, and magnificently extended the church of St. Kentegern. On the third of the kalends of September [30th Aug.] died pope Alexander the third, of pious memory, in the twenty-third year of his pontificate. He was succeeded by Lucius the third, who was previously known as Hubald, bishop of Ostia. Robert, archbishop of York, died on the tenth of the kalends of December [22d Nov.], in the twenty-seventh year of his episcopate.

A. D. 1182. Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, and E[rnald], abbot of Melrose, and Osbert, abbot of Kelso, with many other men of consequence, went to Rome¹ upon the affairs of the king and the kingdom; and having, by God's help, cautiously and prudently accomplished their mission, they returned hale and happy to their own homes. Pope Lucius the third transmitted by them a golden rose to William, the king of the Scots, along with his paternal blessing. The elder Henry, king of England, passed the sea; and, by God's assistance, he brought about a peace between Philip, king of France, and Philip, earl of Flanders. Waldeve,² earl of Dunbar, died, and was succeeded by his son Patrick. The emperor Frederic compelled his nephew, Henry, the duke of Saxony, the son-in-law of Henry, king of England, to go into exile, in consequence of some injustice inflicted upon him; and so he was compelled to betake himself to king Henry in Normandy, where, accompanied by his own family, he arrived sorrowing and lamenting. But he was honourably received, and a place of residence was assigned him during his period of banishment. During the month of September many fishermen and their vessels miserably perished at sea, between Hartlepool and Whitby, during the night.

A. D. 1183. William, king of the Scots, gave, in honourable manner, his daughter Isabella in marriage to Robert de Brus. She was his issue by the daughter of Robert Avenel. A disgraceful and unnatural feud arose among the sons of Henry, king of England, the issue of one mother, whence many evils originated, and many met their death. The younger Henry, king of England, died during the fourteenth year after he had been crowned; this occurred on the third of the ides of June [11th June], at a town called Martel.

A. D. 1184. Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, died. Out of regard to the peace of the church and of the poor, Henry, king of England, although unwillingly, yet did his homage to Philip, king of France, and after Pentecost³ returned prosperously into England. Peter,⁴ abbot of Citeaux, was elected to the bishopric of Araz, and was succeeded by the abbot⁵ of Fontenei. William, king of Scotland, gave his daughter Ada in marriage to earl Patrick. Simon, bishop of Moray, one of our congregation, died on the fifteenth of the kalends of October [17th Sept.]. By God's blessing, the dispute was decided¹ which had existed between the church of Melrose and the men of Wedhale respecting the pasture of the king's forest. This was done at Crosselge by Richard de Morville, the king's constable, and by twelve other faithful men, on the day of St. Luke the evangelist [18th Oct.], in the presence of king William, and his brother earl David, and of many other earls, barons, and people of station. Upon that occasion the twelve jurors made oath in the king's presence, tremblingly and reverently, and upon the reliques of our church; and they affirmed as truth that the king's forest extends as far as the road which runs towards the west of the church of the blessed Mary of Wedhale, and that the pasture of the church of Melrose extends as far as to the boundaries of Wedhale, and as far as the brook called Fasseburn; and this they hold by the gift of three kings, namely, David, Malcolm, and William, and it is confirmed and established beyond doubt or dispute, by the bulls of four or five Roman pontiffs.

The venerable Baldwin, bishop of Worcester, was elected archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1185. Andrew, bishop of Caithness, of pious memory, died at Dunfermlin, on the third of the kalends of January [30th Dec.]. William, formerly abbot of Melrose, of pious memory, died at Rievaulx.

Robert Avenel,² a novice, an intimate friend, died on the eighth of the ides of March [8th March]. He gave to God, and to St. Mary, and to the monks of Melrose, his land of Heskedale, as is witnessed by his charter. May his blessed soul live for ever in glory!

Eraclius, patriarch of Jerusalem, and the prior of the hospital of Jerusalem, came, with difficulty and in grief, to Henry, king of England, humbly intreating his aid and advice; but he did not receive them with the respect and honour which was due to them, as well as to himself.

Henry, king of England, gave, at Windsor, the earldom of Huntingdon to William, king of Scotland, as honourably and fully as he had held it before the war. There was a great earthquake throughout England during the month of April. The sun was eclipsed on the kalends of May [1st May], on the fourth day of the week [Wednesday] in the afternoon, and the stars became visible. A battle was fought in Galloway, upon the fourth of the nones of July, being the fifth day of the week [Thursday, 4th July], between Roland and Gillepatric, in which many were killed on the side of the latter, and he himself was slain with the rest. Roland fought a second battle against Gillecolm, in which Roland's brother fell, and Gillecolm³ was killed.

Pope Lucius the third died, and was succeeded by Urban the third.

A. D. 1186. At a city which is called Dune, in Ireland, were discovered the bodies of certain saints, namely, of St. Patrick, the bishop of St. Columbanus the abbot, and of St. Brigid the virgin. Geoffrey, earl of Brittany, the son of Henry, king of England, died at Paris.¹, abbot of Citeaux, died, and was succeeded by William, abbot of Pratea. Henry, king of England, came to Carlisle in the month of August, with a great army, against Roland. But Roland came to him, under the safe conduct of king William, and did him homage. William, king of the Scots, married a relation of Henry, king of England, named Ermengarda; ² she was the daughter of the count of Beaumont, who was the son of the daughter of the elder son of William the Bastard. The marriage took place with great magnificence, on the nones of September [5th Sept.] (being the sixth day of the week [Friday], the moon being in her eighteenth day), in the royal chapel in the park at Woodstock, in the presence of the king himself. Christian, bishop of Whitherne, of pious memory, died at Holmcultram, on the nones of October [7th Oct.]. Peter,³ abbot of Clairvaux, died, and was succeeded by Guarnerius, abbot of Alta ripa [Auberive].

A. D. 1187. On Sunday, the kalends of March [1st March], Richard, the clerk of king William, was elected to the bishopric of Moray; and on the ides of the same month [15th March], on the day of our Lord's passion, he was consecrated at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, by Hugh, bishop of the same church. Arthur, the son of earl Geoffrey, was born in Brittany, on the kalends of April [1st April], being Easter⁴ eve; his mother was Constance, the daughter of Margaret, the sister of Malcolm and William, kings of Scotland.

The Turks, those enemies of God, violated the church of St. Mary of Nazareth, and slew many people; and there the Master of the Hospital⁵ and five of his knights were killed, as well as many others, on the day of the apostles Philip and James [1st May]. On the Friday after, the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul [3d July], Saladin, king of Babylon, along with more than eighty thousand soldiers, invaded the kingdom of Jerusalem, and took Tiberias by storm, against whom the king of Jerusalem marched with his troops a day's journey towards Tabarum. Having reached a rocky eminence, the king found himself compelled to give battle to the enemies who pressed upon him from every quarter, the barons agreeing thereto. Here the Christians were assailed by king Saladin, with his trumpeters and a countless multitude of soldiers, who attacked them with every species of warfare, while they could offer very little resistance, in consequence of the rugged and broken nature of the ground. They were defeated; and Saladin's nephew, Tochedin, captured as well the king who had taken to flight, as also the cross of our Lord; while nearly all the others were defeated, captured, put in chains, or killed. Saladin forthwith caused the Knights Templars and Hospitallers to be separated from the rest, and then beheaded while he looked on. With his own hands he killed prince Reinald de Castellione; and on that day, as is reported upon good authority, there were beheaded two hundred and thirty of the brethren of the Temple, exclusive of the six hundred who had fallen on the first day of May.

William, king of Scotland, at the head of a considerable army, marched into Moray against Macwilliam;¹ and when the king had reached the town of Inverness with his troops, the earls of Scotland sent their men on the pillage, and they discovered Macwilliam and his followers upon the mount which is called Mamgarvey,² near Moray. They immediately attacked him, and, by God assistance, they killed him and many of his people on the day before the kalends of August [31st July],³ being the sixth day of the week [Friday]. Blessed be God who delivers up the wicked!

Pope Urban the third died on the 4th of the kalends of November [29th Oct.], and on the kalends of the same month [1st Nov.] Gregory the eighth was elected. He had been chancellor, and he was called "Pannosus," according to the translation of abbot ,⁴ and he was consecrated on the eighth of the kalends of the same month [24th Nov.]. On the sixteenth of the kalends of January [17th Dec.], pope Gregory the eighth died, and on the fourteenth of the kalends of the same month [19th Dec.], Clement the fourth was elected, and consecrated on the following day.

A. D. 1188. Philip, king of the Franks, and Henry, king of the English, and Richard, earl of Aquitaine, and Philip, earl of Flanders, and archbishops, and bishops, and earls, and barons, and a countless multitude of the people, rich and poor, and the nobility, of both sexes, pierced by repentance of heart, devoutly took the cross, the sign of our redemption.

Henry, king of England, held a conference after the Purification of the blessed Mary [2d Feb.], at Gaeitun, with his bishops, earls, barons, and nobility, clergy and laity, concerning various matters of business, and there many of them assumed the cross, although conditionally; and the king ordered and strictly enjoined them that they should give the tithes of all their property in England for the relief of the land of Jerusalem, which the Lord had formerly visited for our redemption. Henry, the cardinal, the bishop of the church of Albano, formerly abbot of Clairvaux, died there.

Richard de Morville, the constable, and his wife Avice, and William, their heir, gave to God and St. Mary, and the monks of Melrose, in perpetual alms, the land called Parc,¹ as is witnessed by their charter. May their good gifts be had in eternal remembrance ! Hugh, the bishop of St. Andrew the apostle, died. Silvanus, the fourth abbot of Rievalx, humbly and entirely laid down his stewardship to God at Dundreinan.

A. D. 1189. Aernald, abbot of Melrose, was elected to the cure of souls at Rievalx, on the sixth of the nones of March [Thursday, 2d March], on the fifth day of the week; and Reiner, abbot of Kynlos, a monk of our church, was elected as abbot of Melrose, on the tenth of the kalends of April [Thursday, 23d March], on the fifth day of the week; and Ralph, the prior of Melrose, took the cure of souls at Kynlos after him. Roger, the kinsman and chancellor of king William, was elected to the bishopric of St. Andrew the apostle, upon the ides of April [Friday, 13th April],² being the sixth day of the week, at Perth.

John de Anagnia, the cardinal, and four archbishops, and many bishops, and prelates of various ranks, by the command of pope Clement the fourth, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all persons, as well clergy as laymen, who should impede the accomplishment of a treaty between the two kings of France and England (who were there present, along with earl Richard, and a large assemblage of the people) and the said earl Richard, or should thwart the expedition to Jerusalem. This sentence was pronounced against such persons as the enemies of our Lord's cross (through which arises our life), near the place called "Feritas Bernardi" [La Ferté Bernard], where they had their interview.

Henry, king of England, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou, died at the town of Chinon, on the day before the nones of July [6th July], in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, and he was buried at Fontevraud, in the abbey of the nuns who there serve God. Richard his son, the earl of Aquitaine, succeeded him; he was crowned with great honour at London, by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, and by the other bishops and prelates of England, upon Sunday, the third of the nones of September [3d Sept.].

Ralph, the second abbot of Cupre, died on the kalends of August [Thursday, 1st Aug.],³ being the fifth day of the week; his successor was Adam, the sub-prior of Melrose. Silvanus, formerly abbot of Rievalx, of pious memory, died on the seventh of the ides of October [9th Oct.], at Belelande, and was honourably buried there. Richard de Morville,⁴ the constable of king William, died; he was a firm friend of ours. The emperor Frederick was drowned in a river.

A. D. 1190. William, king of the Scots,⁵ gave ten thousand marks of gold and silver to Richard, king of the English, that he might recover his dignities, liberties, and honours, which he had

Thus, by God's assistance, with dignity and honour to himself, he removed from the kingdom of the Scots the grievous yoke of that state of superiority and slavery to which it had been thus subjected.

Humbly abandoning their kingdoms, homes, and honours, for the sake of Christ, Philip, king of France, Richard, king of England, and Philip, earl of Flanders, in company with Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, and many other archbishops and prelates, princes and dukes, nobles and rich men, and an innumerable multitude of the common people, set out for Jerusalem; and having reached the city of Messana, in Sicily, there they remained all the winter until the month of April. Archbishop Baldwin¹ died at Acon, on the day of St. Edmund [20th Nov.]. Robert, earl of Leicester, Annand, and St. Giles, was taken with sickness, and, dying while in the Mediterranean sea, was buried at Duraz, a city in Greece; whereupon his son Robert² became earl at Messana, in Sicily. The blood of the Jews was shed in many places in England, as if they had been brute beasts: this occurred chiefly in York, where they killed each other. Hereupon they were all expelled. Earl David married the sister of Ralph, earl of Chester, (her name was Matilda,) on the Sunday first after the Assumption of St. Mary [26th Aug.].

A. D. 1191. On the kalends of January [1st Jan.] died Avicia, the wife of Richard de Mereville, the constable of king William. The king of Scots gave his daughter Ysembl (the widow of Robert de Brus), in marriage to Robert de Ross, at Haddington. [⁴Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury (of our order), died in the Land of Promise, as also Ralph de Granville. Robert, earl of Leicester, died near Brundusium; and the king of England gave his earldom of Leicester, and all the other lands which he had held, to his son, Robert de Bretoil, and made him earl thereof at the city of Messana, in Sicily]. Pope Clement the fourth died on the fourth of the nones of April [2d April]; and on the following day Celestine the third, formerly cardinal Jacinctus, succeeded him. On the third of the kalends of April [30th March], the king of France went on board his fleet, being on his voyage to Jerusalem; and he was conducted on his way with great pomp by the king of England and the earl of Flanders, in their galleys. On the fourth of the ides of April [10th April], the king of England and his army embarked in one hundred and fifty ships, and six . . . , and twenty-five lesser vessels, all English bottoms: he took along with him his sister Johanna, and the princess of Navarre, whom he was about to marry. The king of England appointed Arthur, duke of Brittany, as his heir, as well of England as of his other possessions, should it happen that he himself should die without issue; and this he caused to be confirmed by the oath of his bishops, earls, and barons. There was an eclipse of the sun at six o'clock on the vigil of St. John the Baptist, being Sunday, the ninth of the kalends of July [23d June].

A. D. 1192. Richard, abbot of Gedewurthe, died, and was succeeded on the fourth of the kalends of June [29th May], by Ralph, a canon of the same church. Everard,¹ of pious memory, the first abbot of Holmcultram, died; his successor was Gregory, the under-cellarer. Philip, earl of Flanders, died in the land of Jerusalem. After his death Philip, king of France, influenced by covetousness, returned into France from the land of promise without delay, and, more like a heathen man than a Christian, he unjustly invaded, took, and cruelly destroyed the lands, vills, towns, and castles, belonging to the king of England, in Normandy, while he was imprisoned by the emperor; and this he did contrary to peace and justice, and in violation of his oath, and the agreement to which he had sworn.

A. D. 1193. William, king of the Scots, gave his daughter Margaret to Eustace de Vesci, at Rokesburch; she was his issue by the daughter of Adam de Hythusum. King William sent two thousand marks of silver from Rokesburch for the redemption of king Richard. Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, gave² to God and St. Mary of Melrose the church of the bishop St. Kentegern of Hastanedene, in pure and perpetual alms, for the good of his soul and the souls of his predecessors and successors; and this he did before many witnesses, as his charter testifies. May his blessed spirit be for ever in eternal glory, and in happy memory!

Duncan, the son of Gilebert of Galwey, gave to God and to St. Mary, and to the monks of Melrose, a certain portion of his lands in Karec, which is called Maybothel, in perpetual alms, for the health of his own soul and of the souls of all his relatives, in the presence of bishop Joscelin and many witnesses, as his charter³ avouches.

Many persons laid wait, carefully, for Richard, king of England, as he was returning from the land of promise, in the month of November, that they might betray him, and make him prisoner. At length (God so permitting it), he was captured by the men of Leopold, duke of Austria, and was unwillingly carried off, and placed in ward, much to his sorrow. He was afterwards sent to Henry, the emperor of Germany, in whose custody he was kept for more than a whole year, until he should give hostages, and pay the price of his delivery; yet all this while he was treated with respect. See how unexpected and how rapid are the changes of the false and transitory dignities of this world; see how variable and unstable are the security and the protection afforded by the fleeting glories of the present life; see how lamentable, how full of tears is the blind and corruptible ambition of secular power, or of one's own will. To-day a king, to-morrow a captive; to-day in power, to-morrow in prison; to-day rich, to-morrow poor; to-day a freeman, to-morrow a slave. Be wise, therefore, ye judges of the world, come and see the works of the Lord,—see a king made wretched, a proud man humbled, a rich man beggared! Where now is thy boasting? where is thy loftiness, O vain and hollow pride of man? Behold, it mounteth up like smoke, and then vanisheth away, and withers and dies like a flower of the field.

A. D. 1194. On the evening of the third of the ides of March [13th March], being Sunday, king Richard arrived in England, and disembarked at Sandwich with great joy, on his return from his imprisonment and residence abroad; and in the octaves of Easter [17th April], being the fifteenth of the kalends of May, he was crowned at Winchester by Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury. After this, that is to say, during the week before our Lord's Ascension [12th—19th May], he passed over into Normandy with a large body of soldiers. After he had arrived there, Philip, king of France, laid siege to Verneuil, with a considerable number of troops, and various warlike engines, but he returned thence into France in confusion; and he went out of his direct road to burn down the city of Evreux, along with its cathedral church, and its two abbeys, one for monks, and the other for nuns; and he carried off with him into France the reliques of that place. Then about the festival of St. Botulf [17th June], he captured in "Silva Leonis," and imprisoned at Etampes, Robert, earl of Leicester, who had foolishly come out from Rouen, attended by only twenty knights. In the meantime the king of England had taken a town of France called Mirabel, and had levelled it with the ground. Marching from thence to Vendôme, he put to flight the king of France, who was making preparations for the siege of that town; and on the third of the nones of July [5th July], he captured his baggage-wagons, which were laden with many treasures and the furniture of his chapel. A few days afterwards he obtained possession of his castle of Loches (almost by a miracle), which had been burnt down, while the guards of the king of France fled from the fire which they themselves had kindled.

Reiner, the seventh abbot of Melrose, on the fifteenth of the kalends of October [17th Sept.], being a Saturday, humbly resigned, under his seal, the pastoral charge of his abbey to E[rnald] of Rievaulx; Ralph, abbot of Kinlos, succeeded him on the fourteenth of the kalends of October [Tuesday, 18th Sept.], being the second day¹ of the week. Adam, abbot of Cupre, voluntarily resigned his office, and was succeeded by Ernald, prior of Newbottle.

A. D. 1195. Gregory, bishop of Rosmaskin, died, and Reinald, monk of Melrose, was elected as his successor upon the third of the kalends of March [Monday, 27th Feb.], being the second day of the week, at Dunfermelin, and was consecrated on the fourth of the ides of September [10th Sept.]. How wonderfully did the hand of God bring about this election! Hugh, bishop of Durham, died on the fifth of the nones of March [Friday, 3d March], being the sixth day of the week, in the forty-third year of his episcopate. Reinald, the bishop-elect of Rosmark, honourably received the rite of consecration at St. Andrew's in Scotland, upon Sunday, the fourth of the ides of September [10th Sept.], at the hands of John, bishop of Dunkeld. The church of St. Andrew the apostle, of Pebles, was dedicated by Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, on Sunday, the fourth of the kalends of November [29th Oct.]. William, king of Scots, issued a new coinage.

A. D. 1196. John de Rokesburch, treasurer of Glasgow, died at Melrose, on the fourth of the nones of February [2d Feb.], being a novice of that house. William de Moreville, constable of the king of Scots, died.

A. D. 1197. William, king of Jerusalem, died, and also Frederick, the emperor of Germany.

A battle was fought in Moray, near the castle of Inverness, between the followers of the king, and Roderick and Thorphin the son of king Harold: but God decreed that the king's enemies should be defeated, and Roderick was slain, along with many others. Blessed be God over all, who defeats the wicked! After this king William and his army went into Moray, and into the other more remote districts of his kingdom, and there he took prisoner earl Harold, and then caused him to be guarded in the castle of Roxburgh, until his son Thorfin surrendered himself as a hostage for his father.

Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, dedicated his cathedral church, which he had built anew, upon Sunday, the day before the nones of July [6th July], in the twenty-fourth year of his episcopate. A new town was built between Don and Ar.

A. D. 1198. Pope Celestine died on the sixth of the ides of January [8th Jan.], and was succeeded by Innocent. Roger, the son of the earl of Leicester, was consecrated bishop of St. Andrew's, on the first Sunday in Lent [15th Feb.]. Erchinbald, abbot of Dunfermelin died, and was succeeded by Robert of Berwick. Alexander, the son of William, king of the Scots, was born on the day of St. Bartholomew the apostle [24th Aug.], and at his birth many rejoiced.

A. D. 1199. Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, died at Melrose, upon the sixteenth of the kalends of April [17th March]. Richard, king of England, died¹ on the day before the ides of April [12th April]. Ernald, abbot of Rievaulx, resigned his pastoral care, and was succeeded by William de Punchard. John, king of England, was crowned on Ascension day [27th May]. Hugh, the chancellor, died on the sixth of the ides of July [10th July]. Matthew, bishop of Aberdeen, died on the thirteenth of the kalends of September [20th Aug.]. William Malvesine was made chancellor on the sixth of the ides of September [8th Sept.].

A. D. 1200. William, master of the converts of Melrose, was made abbot of Cupre on the eighteenth of the kalends of February [15th Jan.]. William Malvesine was consecrated.

A. D. 1201. Hugh, abbot of Newbottle, humbly resigned his office, and was succeeded by Adam, the master of the converts of the same establishment. The nobility of the land swore fealty to Alexander, the king's son, on the fourth of the ides of October [12th Oct.], at Muchselburg. John de Salerno, presbyter-cardinal, held his council at Perth, and there enacted the observance of many constitutions.

A. D. 1202. Roger, bishop of St. Andrew's, died, and was succeeded by William Malvecine, bishop of Glasgow. John de Salerno, the legate of the apostolic see, having gone into Ireland, made Ralph, abbot of Melrose, bishop at Down, and he was succeeded in the government of Melrose by William, abbot of Cupre. Ralph, bishop of Brechin, was consecrated. William Malvecine was translated from Glasgow to St. Andrew's. The legate of the apostolic see, whom we have already mentioned, was honourably received at Melrose; and there he remained for more than fifty nights, chiefly for the purpose of putting an end to the dispute which existed between the monks of Kelso and those of Melrose. He gave ample promises to both parties, but satisfaction to neither; and after having received from each very numerous gifts in gold and silver, and a large number of horses, he departed thence, having done no good to either of the disputants, but left the suit¹ in much the same state as he found it.

A. D. 1203. John, bishop of Dunkeld, of happy memory, died, and was succeeded by Robert de Prebenda, the king's clerk and kinsman. Richard, bishop of Moray, died, and was succeeded by Brice, prior of Lesmahagu. Ernisius, abbot of Rufford, died. Osbert, abbot of Kelso, died, and was succeeded by Geoffrey, prior of the same place. William, abbot of Rievaulx, died. William of Blois was made bishop of Lincoln. King John returned into England, after having disgracefully lost his lands and castles on the continent.

A. D. 1204. Geoffrey undertook the rule of Rievaulx. Alan Fitz Walter died. Queen Elianor died. Danecastre [Doncaster] was entirely destroyed by fire on Easter eve [24th April]. Earl Duncan² died. Geoffrey de Luci, bishop of Winchester, died. In the land of promise seven bishops renounced the Christian faith. Baldwin, earl of Flanders, became emperor at Constantinople. By the treacherous behaviour of his own people, John de Curci was taken prisoner by Hugh de Lasci. Peter, abbot of Weburn, died at Vacellæ [Vaucluse]. Alexander, abbot of Sautrey, died.

A. D. 1205. Earl David performed his homage to his nephew Alexander, the son of king William. Two moons appeared in the sky at the same time; both of them were of the same size. Their horns touched each other at one extremity, but they were widely apart on the other; at last, however, they coalesced. A frost, severe and terrible, and of long continuance, everywhere destroyed the sheep and oxen and horses which were in the woods. The walls of Rouen were levelled with the ground, by the men of the king of France. Hugh, archbishop of Canterbury, died on the third of the ides of July [7th Aug.].¹ Ralph, abbot of Jedde-worth, died on the seventh of the ides of August [7th Aug.]

A. D. 1206. Richard de Cave was made abbot of Kelso, on the fourth of the kalends of April [29th March]. On the ides of April [11th April], the moon being nineteen days old, thunder was heard. On the 7th of the kalends of May [25th April], such a great quantity of snow fell, as would scarce be credited by those persons who had not seen it. On the sixth of the ides of May [10th May], William of Blois, bishop of Lincoln, died. Earl Arald² died. William, the ninth abbot of Melrose, died on the sixth of the ides of June [8th June]. Patric, sub-prior of Melrose, was made the abbot of the same place.

A. D. 1207. John, bishop of Aberdeen, died, after whom Adam, the king's clerk (who was surnamed of Calder³), was elected. Patric, the tenth abbot of Melrose, of good remembrance, died, and was succeeded by Adam, the prior of the same place. Florence the [bishop] elect of Glasgow, resigned his charge by the pope's permission. William, bishop of St. Andrew's, spent some time abroad. Ralph de Sules was killed in his own house by his own domestics. The greater part of Roxburgh was accidentally destroyed by fire. Walter, the king's chaplain, was elected bishop of Glasgow, on the fifth of the ides of December [9th Dec.]. An angel appeared to a certain holy hermit and repeated these words to him, "Roman shall rise against Roman, and at Rome Roman shall supersede Roman. The new flock shall always be upon the increase. The shepherds' staves shall be lightened, and their leader shall be a consolation. Rain shall begin to fall from a heavy cloud, for one is born who shall change the course of the world."

Udard, abbot of Coupre, died; his successor was Richard.

A. D. 1208. England was placed under interdict in the month of March, fifteen days before Easter [23d March]. The cause was this. Upon the death of Walter Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, a dispute arose between the king and the monks concerning the election of a successor, the king making choice of one, the monks of another. Several of the monks being arrived at Rome, advocating the causes of the several candidates, the pope, after he had heard the pleadings on each side, quashed the election of all of them, and enjoined that they should proceed anew with an election, according to the canons, and that this should be done in his presence. Hereupon they chose Master Stephen de Langton, and the pope wrote to the king of England respecting him, in terms of recommendation, and requesting that he might be accepted. Hereupon the king was grievously offended; not only because his own nomination had been set aside, but also because his messengers, the monks, had acted contrary to their promise; and so he swore that he would never accept this same Stephen. The pope bore with this for a considerable time, and wrote to the king, and admonished him, but his admonitions went for nothing; and then (as has been said), he placed the land under an interdict, so that no [mass] could be chanted, either in public or in private, and it was so arranged that neither might the dying have communion, nor the dead burial.

Philip, bishop of Durham, died. Apprehensive of the king's tyranny, almost all the clergy deserted Oxford; but a few of them, who had remained for a short time afterwards, at length departed, in consequence of divine service being suspended throughout the whole town by the interdict; and some went to Reading, and part of them to Paris. Richard, abbot of Kelso, died, and was succeeded by Henry, the prior of the said house, on the fifteenth of the kalends of July [Wednesday, 17th June]. On the ides of September [10th Sept.], being the fourth day of the week, the new burial-ground at Driburgh was dedicated by William, bishop of St. Andrew's. Gilbert, formerly abbot of Alnwick, died, and was succeeded in the following year by Godfrey, abbot of Driburgh; and in his room William, prior of Driburgh, was elected abbot of the same house.

Walter, the [bishop] elect of Glasgow, was consecrated in his see at Glasgow, on the day of the commemoration of All Souls [2d Nov.], he having obtained the pope's sanction. Adam, abbot of Alnwick, was deposed on the fifth of the ides of December.

A. D. 1209. John, king of England, commanded William, king of Scotland, to meet him at Newcastle; they met at Boyeltun. So William, king of the Scots, and the king of England, came to Norham on the ninth of the kalends of May [Thursday, 23d April], on the fifth day of the week, and upon both occasions, as well in going as returning, he took up his abode at Alnwick, at his own costs; and both kings had a conference at the castle aforesaid, but the interview was broken off on the sixth of the kalends of May [26th April], no good having resulted from it.

Ralph, the priest of Dunbar, accepted the cure of Heccles. John, bishop of Whithern, died, and was succeeded by Walter, the chamberlain of Alan Fitz Roland. Ralph, the archdeacon of St. Andrew's, died, and was succeeded by master Lawrence, the official. Alan¹ Fitz Roland married the daughter of earl David, the brother of the king of Scotland.

Our lord the pope gave permission that once in the week divine service might be celebrated in the abbeys throughout England, but in a low voice, with closed doors, and after the seculars had been excluded.

About the feast of St. James [25th July], the kings of England and Scotland, with their respective armies, had a meeting, and then peace was concluded between them,—upon these terms, however, that the king of Scotland should give the king of England his two daughters to be assigned in marriage, along with thirteen thousand pounds, and should be permitted to overthrow the castle which had been erected opposite to Berwick; and this was done. And for the observance of the peace he gave him as hostages the sons of the nobility of the land; but this was done contrary to the wishes of the Scots.

About the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.], the bishops of Salisbury and Rochester came into Scotland, of whom one, he, namely, of Salisbury, took up his residence at Kelso, the other at Roxburgh; but each paid his own expenses. To mark his respect for those venerable persons, the king of Scotland gave them eighty chalders of wheat, sixty-six of barley, and eighty of oats.

Richard,¹ abbot of Cupre, resigned, and was succeeded by Alexander.

A. D. 1210. Richard, bishop of Dunkeld, died in the month of May; and Thomas de Colville² was taken prisoner, and placed in confinement at Edinburgh, on account of the rebellion which he had been plotting against his king and lord, as report had generally stated. At the feast of St. Martin [11th Nov.], he redeemed himself.

Having collected an army, king John subdued Ireland in the month of June; on his return from Ireland he plundered the Cistercian monks in many places. As for the Jews, he pillaged them of nearly everything they possessed, and drove them out of their houses; the eyes of some he plucked out, some he starved to death, and all of them he reduced to such an extremity of want, that they, though Jews, went from door to door, asking food from the Christians, in the name of Jesus Christ. Thus they were starved like the dogs, and went about the city; so that in them was fulfilled, in the literal sense, that which had been prophesied of them as follows: "They go to and fro in the evening; they grin like a dog, and run about through the city." [Ps. lix. 6.] As soon as the king of France became aware of this, he cunningly issued a proclamation that all the Jews should at one and the same time be committed to prison throughout all the provinces of France; for he was well aware of the fact, that however far apart the Jews might be situated from each other, however scattered through the different quarters of the globe, yet they were bound together by one common bond of infidelity, and supported each other to the best of their ability in every necessity. When this had been done, he so thoroughly pillaged them in every way, that they could not provide even for themselves; moreover, he restored to his knights, without interest, those lands and title-deeds which they had pledged to the Jews, and so "the rich he sent empty away."

In the same year a great council was held at Paris, where had been summoned the archbishops, bishops, and other prelates of the whole Gallican church, and all the magistracy of the city. It was directed chiefly against those superstitious heretics who had crept into widows' houses, and by their perverted interpretation of Holy Scripture, had secretly seduced a very great multitude of the simple ones. It is wiser, however, to conceal their lamentable errors, than to publish them by description. In this same council some of them were convicted of heretical pravity, and of being followers of the wicked sect of their master Amauri; whose bones (after having been first excommunicated by all the archbishops and bishops, in the sight and hearing of all the people,) were commanded to be cast out of the consecrated burial-ground, in order that the others might take a warning. As for the heretics themselves, after having been degraded in the presence of all the people, in the fields near the chapel of St. Honorat, fifteen days before Christmas [11th Dec.], and then handed over to the lay power, they were burnt with fire by the king's orders, three days afterwards. So obdurate were they in their obstinacy, that even in the flames they uttered not the faintest sound. The lay people called them Papelards.¹ Master Robert de Cursun,² a man of venerable life, and illustrious in every branch of learning, (to whom our lord the pope had entrusted the chief office of preaching in France,) heartily persecuted these false prophets from the outset, and called them Almaricans, from the forenamed Almaric, or Godini, from one Godinus, a leader of that heresy of theirs, who suffered death by the infliction of the same punishment. Many of those who had fallen into this same error, but had repented, were consigned to imprisonment for life, having been previously degraded from holy orders. Thus it happened that in this year there was a great persecution, as well of Jews as of heretics.

Louis, the son of Philip, king of France, was knighted by his father with the greatest pomp and rejoicings, at St. Lice, on the day of St. John the Baptist [24th June].

A. D. 1211. On the day of St. Mary Magdalene [22d July], John, archdeacon of Lothian, was elected bishop of Dunkeld. William, dean of Cunningham, died. William de Bois was made the chancellor of our lord the king of Scotland, on the vigil of SS. Peter and Paul [28th June]. The king of England fortified castles in Wales, and so subdued it. Warin, abbot of Rievaulx, died, and was succeeded by Elias, the cellarer of the same house. Three abbots, those, namely, of Fountains, of Furnes, and of Caldre, received the benediction from our lord R. bishop of Down, at Melrose, upon the day of St. Lucy [13th Dec.]; and moreover, two abbots besides received the gift of the benediction from him this same year.

During this year an innumerable destruction of men took place in every region. It commenced in the East, and did not cease until it reached the West. There was a man named Otho, illustrious amongst all his compeers for nobility of family; he was eminent and conspicuous in every battle, a champion who distinguished himself in every army. Him our lord the pope promoted to be emperor, anointed him, and crowned him. After he had subdued very many of the eastern provinces, and had been the cause of countless deaths, but not yet satisfied with human gore, he at last laid his bloody hands upon his own mother; and having abridged by violence the dignities of the apostolic see, he endeavoured thereby to augment his own possessions. O how insatiable is the greed of ambition, which always howls for more in proportion as its unsatisfied hunger has been gorged! O how accursed a thing is that craving after the dignities of this world, which always disregards the limits of right and wrong, and always promises its followers that it has in store for them some position yet more elevated, and after having compelled them to stretch out their sacrilegious hands even against God, then, at last, secretly plunges them into the filthy abyss of every vice. These remarks apply with equal truth to all those persons who presume to lay violent hands upon any of the possessions of holy mother church. Need we say more? The apostolic sentence was pronounced and promulgated against him, and upon its promulgation a new emperor was appointed by the papal edict. But what was the end of this very disgraceful strife, or with what result it was ultimately attended, the following narrative will declare more fully.

² A good account of this individual may be seen in Oudin, ii. 1715. See also Tanner, Bibl. p. 213.

In this same year the following incident occurred. The Albigenses, a race of people cruel and rejected by God, who cast off the righteousness of God, and wished to substitute their own, assailed the religion of the catholic faith with open warfare. Whereupon, by the incitement of the apostolic see, and by the preaching of God's word, but chiefly by the inspiration of divine grace, no small body of the faithful with one assent met together in the parts of Tolouse, to oppose these mockers of God's law; and having been arranged in troops, they engaged the infidels in a pitched battle, in which they slew an unprecedented number of them. This occurred in the month of September, on the fourth day after the feast of St. Mary,¹ in the year one thousand two hundred and eleven, under that most Christian leader and most victorious earl Simon, surnamed de Munforde, or de Rocheford, who from the outset had persecuted that people with the strictest severity.

Scarce had this disturbance been brought to an end, and put down, when lo! a new persecution of the Christians sprang up in another quarter. A bold and yet ignominious body of pagans landed from a considerable fleet upon the shores of Spain, and challenged the Christians to battle. The bold-hearted king (whose surname, however, stiled him "the Little,") attacked them with his troops, and, aided by God's power, crushed nearly the whole of them; for their king or chieftain (called de Mairhoc) had difficulty in escaping with his life, covered with disgrace.

The king of France shed no small quantity of human blood in reducing to his own power the land belonging to the king of England which was situated on the continent. The like slaughter was perpetrated by the king of England in conquering the land of Ireland and Wales. Then the king of Scotland, while he was following up Guthred, the son of Macwilliam, and destroying those persons who had led him astray, left his path strewn with many dead bodies.

A. D. 1212. A general decree went out from pope Innocent throughout all the Christian world, that, putting aside any excuse, all the pastors of the churches should assemble at Rome upon a fixed day, that is to say, upon the kalends of November [1st Nov.], one thousand two hundred and fifteen, for the purpose of there celebrating a general council. Exception, however, was made in favour of a few who by common consent should remain in each country for the cure of souls. In the meantime the bishops should with all carefulness preach the Word of life, strengthen those who were weak in the faith, and further should sign them with the sign of the sacred cross, in aid of the holy land of promise, which at that time was being treated infamously and disgracefully by the Saracens.

Many were the great lights which were sent a latere from the pope. Doctors of most holy conversation, and of learning the most refined, came into every region of the world. Of these, two were sent hither; one into England and the other into France; the former of these was master Stephen de Langton, consecrated archbishop of Canterbury; he who was despatched into France was master Robert de Curzun, presbyter and cardinal of the apostolic see, who was appointed legate and arbitrator for the whole of that kingdom. By the example of their holy conversation, and by the ministry of their catholic preaching, it was intended that they should illuminate both realms. By the advice of the aforesaid master Robert, the king of France expelled from all his cities all public usurers and common prostitutes, and all others who held our holy religion in contempt.

Alexander, son of William the king of the Scots, went to London, and received the order of knighthood from the king of England, upon the eighth of the ides of March [8th March], at the "Lætare Jerusalem,"¹ being then in the nineteenth year of his age. Having thus been honourably knighted, he returned home with the approbation and congratulations of both realms.

At this time there came forth in England a man of surprising boldness and abstinence, Peter by name, who declaring future events (I do not know by what spirit he was inspired), was in the habit of rebuking the king of England from day to day, for his cruelty towards the church; and told him loudly, and to his face, that before long he would lose the honour of the kingdom, and even the name of a king. This, in fact, came to pass for the greater part ere long, as the succession of our history will make manifest.

A. D. 1213. Reinald, bishop of Ross, formerly a monk of Melrose, died on the day of St. Lucy [13th Dec.]. After his death master Andrew de Moray was elected; but he refusing to be made a bishop, humbly resigned the honour of so great a dignity, having first obtained the pope's permission to do so. In his stead Robert, the chaplain of William, king of Scots, was appointed.

Adam, abbot of Melrose, was elected to the cure of the bishopric of Caithness, on the nones of August [5th Aug.]. Ernard, abbot of Citeaux, was elected, and consecrated archbishop of Narbonne.¹ By diligently preaching the Word of life, by confirming the faith of Christ, and by persecution, he succeeded in destroying the sect of the Albigenses. His successor was Ernald,² abbot "de Fonte Johannis." Wido,³ abbot of Clairvaux, exhausted by the long-continued strictness of the order, which pressed heavily upon his old age, resigned to God and the order the seal and superiority of the establishment, which he could no longer sustain. A few days after this he departed from this world, in the ripeness of a venerable old age, and was succeeded by Conrad,⁴ abbot of Villiacum, of Brabant.

Adam, abbot of Newbottle, in the beauty of humility, resigned his office; he was succeeded by Alan, sub-prior of Melrose. William de Montibus, the chancellor of the church of Lincoln, died after Easter,⁵ a man of pious memory. In the next year, when Christian rites were restored to England, his body was translated into the church of Lincoln, and there buried with the honour which was its due.

A. D. 1214. The forenamed Adam, abbot of Melrose, was consecrated bishop of Caithness, by William Malvecine, bishop of St. Andrew's, on the day of St. Mamertus the bishop, in the month of May [11th May]; and on the ides of May [15th May] he was succeeded by Hugh de Clippestun, a monk of the same house. William, king of Scotland, of holy memory, going the way of all flesh, departed to the Lord by a happy death, in the forty-ninth year of his reign, in the seventy-second year of his age, on the second of the nones of December [4th Dec.], leaving his kingdom in a state of profound peace. His son Alexander, (being now in the seventeenth year of his age,) attended by a vast concourse of the nobility, proceeded to Scone, and there, according to the royal custom, and with the usual solemnities, he assumed the government of the realm of Scotland upon the eighth of the ides of December [6th Dec.], in equal honour and peace.

William, the cellarer of Melrose, was elected abbot of Glenluce. The church of St. Mary of Hawic was dedicated by Adam, bishop of Caithness, upon the fourth of the kalends of June [29th May].

The abbot of Citeaux arrived in England for the purposes of his visitation. John, bishop of Dunkeld, of pious memory, died upon the nones of October [7th Oct.], after whom Hugh, the clerk De Sigillo, was elected. Alan, abbot of Newbottle, returned to his own house with humble devotion, and resigned the cure of its administration upon the eighth of the kalends of June [25th May], in the chapter; Richard, the cellarer of the same house, succeeded him.

Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, came into England between Easter and Whitsunday [30th March—18th May], while all rejoiced and said, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." [Matt. xxi. 9.] The interdict ceased throughout England about the kalends of July [1st July].

One of the pope's clerks, named Pandulf, was sent into England to soften the king's heart, and persuade him to make condign satisfaction; he returned to Rome, having made some progress towards a reconciliation, though it had not been fully completed. On his return another personage of considerable repute was despatched; his name was Nicolas, a Cistercian monk, the chief penitentiary of the apostolic see. The object of his mission was this; that by his legatine authority he should confirm the peace of which the terms had already been agreed upon, and after having received from the king the satisfaction which was due, he should absolve him from the bond of the anathema. But while this was in progress, Philip, king of France, (acting, doubtlessly, by divine influence,) boldly rose against the king of England, and marched with a large army to the coast opposite his realms. Moreover, that simple prophet, P[eter], whom we have already mentioned, redoubled his rebukes in the very face of the king, and constantly announced that he would be deprived of his royal dignity; and he remarked to him that the son of a certain good woman would reign after him; meaning thereby, (as we understand it,) that he would be succeeded by Philip, the son of holy mother Church. Terrified, therefore, by these manifold alarms, when the cardinal arrived he did his homage to God and the holy mother church of Rome, and to the pope; and with surprising meekness he resigned into the hands of the legate the perpetual subjection of his realm; and as a testimony of this his subjection and homage, not only he, but also the nobility of his land, promised, by oath upon the holy shrines, that he and all his heirs would pay a yearly tribute of one thousand marks (that is to say, seven hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland,) out of their own resources, to God and the pope, and all his successors. The oath contained this addition; that he would make full restitution of everything which he had extorted from the churches, and from ecclesiastical persons, from the period when his land had first been laid under interdict; and that henceforth he would hold his land from the lord pope as from a supreme king. All these things the king very readily promised to do, and he placed the crown of his realm under the feet of the legate. Blessed be God, the strong and the powerful over all, who knoweth, according to his good pleasure, how to bow under Himself the necks of the proud, and how to call to repentance the hearts of the stubborn ones. Yet not even now understanding that he had forfeited the kingly name, and lost his former honour, he commanded that this P[eter] (whom we have more than once mentioned) should be put to a cruel death, an act which he afterwards most bitterly repented, as we shall have occasion to show presently.

A battle was fought in Flanders, between Tournay and the bridge of Bovines, between Philip, king of France, and Otho, who had formerly been emperor of Germany, upon the Sunday next after the feast of St. James [27th July], which this year fell upon the sixth of the kalends of August. It appears from the written account sent by H.,¹ abbot of Ursicampum, to A[rnald], abbot of Citeaux,² that in this fight there were captured, on the side of Otho, the earl of Flanders, the earl of Boulogne, the earl of Salisbury, the earl of Tenekebrok, and the earl "Pilosus." Many barons of Flanders and Germany, and their sons, as well as many of the more illustrious and braver of the knights who took part in the battle, were also made prisoners, whom this abbot enumerated by name to the extent of nearly seven score. On Otho's side were thirty thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand foot soldiers; the account of the knights who were captured was one hundred and twenty; seventy were killed. Of the foot soldiers, three thousand times three thousand were slain. On the side of the French only three knights fell. It is true that the king of France was thrown off his horse, and fell into the midst of the fiercest of his enemies, who thirsted for nothing more than his blood; but by God's mercy, by the intercession with God of the Cistercian order (as he afterwards admitted), and by the courage of his own soldiers—some of whom allowed themselves to be killed over his body—he remounted his horse and escaped in safety. We cannot pass unnoticed, that the earl of Boulogne (whose rebellion was the cause of the whole war), when he threw himself on the ground before the king of France and entreated his forgiveness, observed that he had done no wrong to that sovereign; whereupon the king indignantly reminded him of all the benefits which he had conferred upon him, and how ungratefully he had always repaid his kindness, and at last broke out in these words, "Be silent; for by the bones of St. James I will cause your eyes to be plucked out: and be assured of this, that as long as I am alive you shall never come forth from your prison." Moreover, he bound the keepers with an oath that they would not release the earl from prison, save only into his own hands, and that they would pay no attention either to his message or his letters. And lastly, he caused two strong and massive chains to be fixed in the trunk of a tree, bound to which, the earl became the warden of Peronne, much against his own inclination.

A. D. 1215. Conrad, abbot of Clairvaux, arrived in England for the purpose of visiting the houses of that order; and this he did with considerable rigour; and in the daughter establishments he enjoined that many severe and strict rules should be observed, according to the institution of the order.

Helyas, abbot of Rievalx, resigned his office, and was succeeded by Henry, abbot of Wardon, on the sixth of the ides of April [8th April]. Roger, master of the converts of Wardon, was elected abbot of the same house on the third of the kalends of May [29th April]. An inroad was made into Moray by the enemies of our lord the king of Scotland; that is, by Donald Ban, the son of Macwilliam, and Kennauh mac Aht, and the son of a certain king of Ireland, at the head of a large troop of wicked ones. Machentagar attacked these enemies of the king, and crushed them effectually ; he cut off their heads, and presented this new kind of offering to the new king on the seventeenth of the kalends of July [15th June]; whereupon our lord the king made him a new knight.

A¹ new state of things begun in England ; such a strange affair as had never before been heard ; for the body wished to rule the head, and the people desired to be masters over the king. The king, it is true, had perverted the excellent institutions of the realm, and had mismanaged its laws and customs, and misgoverned his subjects. His inclination became his law ; he oppressed his own subjects ; he placed over them foreign mercenary soldiers, and he put to death the lawful heirs, of whom he had obtained possession as his hostages, while an alien seized their lands. The knights were summoned to discuss the matter with the king, but they consulted their own safety and came armed. With one consent they swore that they would no longer endure the tyranny of this ungrateful king. When they assembled on the first day they were willing to submit to the law ; but the king delayed to meet them, and would not stand to the right. He fixed a second day at a future time, but neither did he keep that appointment ; they, however, assembled with the intention of compelling him to do so. They now demand that he shall be deposed unless he make a thorough reform in the laws, and give good security that he keep the peace inviolate. They tendered back to him the homage which they had previously made ; and the barons took up the cause of the knights. They then arranged themselves in seven troops, and took possession of the lands, cities, farms, and castles. They who sided with the king ravaged the lands of these persons ; and thus innumerable evils occurred on both sides ; and the longer this state of hostility continued, the more men were slain, the greater was the loss which was incurred. At last a form of peace was concluded on both sides ; for although they earnestly desired that the older laws of the realm should be restored to them, they were unwilling to lay violent hands upon the king ; and they demanded that the king should give his entire assent to this. But he refused to do so at first, and left them ; but at length he was compelled to make every concession ; and, in order to secure his own safety from the troops, he promised that he would observe whatever they required of him. Thus the entire treaty was reduced to writing by both parties, and they requested that the king would affix his seal to it. He quietly promised that he would do so ; yet, after considerable delays, he expressed his wish that they should meet him at Oxford. Having assembled his troops, the king kept his appointment, but there he gainsaid the articles of peace. Hereupon the barons departed in great indignation, and so the last mistake was worse than the former.

The king hereupon adopted a new mode of doing mischief ; instigated by some Achitophel (by whom it is not known), he resolved that he would entirely eradicate from England all those of English descent, and that he would give the country to be perpetually held by foreign nations. But He who is the King of kings and Lord of lords, and whose decree can never be set aside, had decreed otherwise; for He in his mercy freed the innocent ones, and wonderfully brought to nought the counsel of Achitophel. For while one of the king's party, who was in the parts beyond the sea, whose name was Hugh de Boves, had assembled a very large fleet of ships, and had filled them to overflowing with a countless number of evil-disposed persons, it happened that when, upon the sixth of the kalends of October [26th Sept.], this same Hugh, with all that multitude of ships, had sailed for England, at the command of the great King the waves of the sea arose; and not only did the leader of this piece of wickedness sink like lead to the bottom of the raging billows, but all those wicked ones by whom he was accompanied were suddenly drowned, so that out of the entire number of the ships scarce one reached the shore for which they were bound. The greedy sea-waves swallowed up as well the sailors and the passengers as the ships themselves; and only a very few were saved; who, after a long-continued exposure to the violence of the tempestuous winds, with great difficulty escaped the great danger of their critical position. And it is believed that they would not even then have been delivered, had not they repented them of the crime which they had planned, and with sincere compunction of heart had sought forgiveness of Him who rules over the powers of the deep, and whom the sea and the winds obey. For with tears and weeping they made a vow that they would undertake the holy journey to Jerusalem, and they mutually received upon their own bodies the sign of the holy cross. Blessed be God over all! who did not refrain from inflicting merited punishment upon the misbelievers and the obstinate, and yet who calmed down the power of the mighty deep for those who repented themselves and entreated for pardon.

A general council was celebrated at Rome for fifteen days from the kalends of November [1st Nov.]. By the inspiration of this council many constitutions were decreed for the rooting out of vices, and for the destruction of heretics, for the confirmation of the faithful, and for the improvement of manners. Among other matters it was decided, and (with the approval of the council) strictly enjoined by the apostolic authority, that all persons who enjoyed ecclesiastical benefices, as well subjects as prelates, for the next three years should contribute the full twentieth part of all their ecclesiastical revenues for the assistance of the Holy Land, to be collected by those persons whom the pope, in his wisdom, should appoint for this purpose. Exception, however, was made in favour of some religious bodies, and of those individuals who intended personally to go to the Holy Land. And that they might not appear to be laying an intolerable burden upon the shoulders of others, the lord pope himself, and all the cardinals, paid a tithe of all their revenues. Besides this, the lord pope awarded thirty thousand pounds to the crusaders, and on another occasion three thousand marks. It was ruled that in the second year afterwards, that is to say, in the year one thousand two hundred and seventeen from our Lord's incarnation, all they who were marked with the cross should assemble from all parts of the globe upon the kalends of June [1st June], and meet in the realm of Sicily. It is to be remarked, that in this same council (in which pope Innocent the third presided, in the eighteenth year of his pontificate, and which is called that of Constantine,) there were present four hundred and twelve bishops, among whom were two of the chief patriarchs, those, namely, of Constantinople and Jerusalem. The patriarch of Antioch was unable to attend, being at that time confined at home by a severe illness; but in his stead he sent his representative, the bishop of Antidore. The patriarch of Alexandria did his best, for as he himself was under the power of the Saracens, he sent his brother, who was a deacon. There were seventy-one primates and metropolitans, and more than eight hundred abbots and priors. No exact enumeration was made of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, and chapters who were absent. There were present, legates from the king of Sicily, at that time the emperor-elect of the Romans, from the emperor of Constantinople, the king of France, the king of England, the king of Hungary, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Cyprus, and the king of Aragon. So enormous was the multitude of other princes, nobles, representatives of cities, and others, that one bishop died, being stifled in the crowd. When this fact reached the ears of our lord the pope, he swore by St. Peter that this man should have a tomb of marble.

On the sixteenth of the kalends of November [17th Oct.], one of the best granges of Cupre was burnt down by occasion of a candle which had been badly and carelessly placed. It was full of corn, and in it was a convert, the keeper of the grange.

On the fourteenth of the kalends of November [19th Oct.], Alexander, by the grace of God king of the Scots, and his entire army, began to lay siege to the castle of Norham. After having continued the siege for forty days, and finding that he made no progress, he withdrew. On the eleventh of the kalends of November [22d Oct.], our lord Alexander, the king of the Scots, received the homage of the barons of Northumberland at Felton. On the nones of November [5th Nov.], died Philip de Valoniis, the chamberlain of our lord William, king of Scots, who was conveyed to Melrose, and honourably interred there in the chapter-house of the monks. In this same year, in the general chapter at Citeaux, Hugh, abbot of Melrose, resigned his office, and was succeeded by William, abbot of Holmcultram, on the sixteenth of the kalends of December [16th Nov.].

Upon occasion of the general council, William Malvecine, bishop of St. Andrew's, Walter, bishop of Glasgow, Brice, bishop of Moray, and Henry, abbot of Kelso, set out from Scotland for the court of Rome. Two of these persons, that is to say, the bishop of Moray and the abbot of Kelso, returned to Scotland upon the termination of the council; the bishop of Glasgow returned the third year afterwards; the bishop of St. Andrew's at the commencement of the fourth year. The other prelates did not personally attend at Rome, but sent their legates.

A. D. 1216. In the month of January, there occurred an unprecedented destruction of villas and towns in Northumberland, and in the southern parts of Scotland. For king John having heard that Alexander, the king of Scots, had laid claim to Northumberland, and had received the homage of the barons of that district, took with him his mercenary soldiers and marched towards Scotland with great energy. As soon as his advance was known to the barons of Yorkshire, who had taken an oath against him, they were so terrified that they fled for protection to the king of Scotland; and when they reached his presence they did homage to him, and one and all of them swore fealty to him, and gave him security upon the reliques of the saints, upon the third of the ides of January [11th Jan.], in the chapter-house of the monks of Melrose. The king of England followed up upon their track, and in his revenge devastated their villas and towns, and estates and farms, with fire and sword. For these barons had themselves burnt up their own villas and corn before the king's arrival, with the intention that when he came he might have no assistance from thence; so that, between the two, a large portion of the district was destroyed by fire. For the town of Werc was burnt down on the third of the ides of January [11th Jan.]; Alnwick, on the fifth of the same [9th Jan.]; Mitford and Morpath, on the seventh of the ides of the same [7th Jan.]; and on the seventeenth of the kalends of February [16th Jan.], Roxburgh, with its surrounding villages and the larger portion of its outskirts.

On the eighteenth of the kalends of February [15th Jan.], king John took the town and castle of Berwick, where he and his mercenary soldiers conducted themselves with unparalleled ferocity and inhuman tyranny; for as many men and women as these slaves of the devil could secure, they hung up by the joints of their hands and feet, and subjected them to torments of all kinds, but of the greatest intensity, for the sake of plunder. It is reported that they took with them several Jews, to instruct them in this wickedness. Marching onwards, he burnt down Haddington on the third day; and he committed to the devouring flame Dunbar and other towns in that same district. Upon his return, his mercenaries, these ministers of the devil, pillaged the abbey of Coldingham, and afterwards burnt down the town of Berwick, the king himself setting them the example. Report says, that he himself, with his own hand, disgracefully fired the house which had sheltered him, contrary to the habit of a king.

In this same year, in the month of February, Alexander, king of the Scots, advanced with the whole of his powerful army upon the track of the king of England, and ravaged with fire and sword his land as far as Carlisle. But upon this occasion it is to be lamented that certain Scots, devils rather than soldiers, contrary to the wishes and expressed commands of the king, (who had given firm peace to men of religion,) in their accursed and sacrilegious madness, pillaged the house of Holmcultram of everything upon which they could lay their hands,—holy books, vestments, chalices, horses and cattle, utensils and garments; so that they even stripped to the skin a monk who was lying at his last gasp in the infirmary, taking from him the very rags which he had about him; nor did they exhibit any reverence to the holy altars. This sin, however, did not pass unpunished; for, as they were returning with their prey, there were drowned in the river Eden, more than one thousand nine hundred Scotchmen in one short hour of the day, as nearly as can be reckoned. This was the merited punishment of God.

In the same year, in the month of July, the king of Scotland marched towards Carlisle with the whole of his army, excepting the Scots from whom he took a money payment; and having laid siege to this town, it surrendered to him upon the sixth of the ides of August [8th Aug.]. At this time, however, he did not obtain possession of the castle. Advancing onwards from that point, he marched with the whole of his army through the very heart of England as far as Dover, to meet Louis, the son of the king of France; king John all this time looking on in indignation. Louis had disembarked upon the second of the nones of May [6th May] this year, from a large fleet which he had brought over at the instigation and for the assistance of the barons of England. At the very commencement of this expedition, Eustace de Vesci,¹ the king's son-in-law, was killed at the siege of Bernard Castle.

It must not be forgotten, that as soon as Louis arrived in England, William Longsword, earl of Salisbury,² the brother of the king of England, and many others, deserted the king and passed over to Louis; but the rebellion which afterwards broke out made it clear that they did this more in treachery than in love, more for the sake of injury than assistance. For at this time, when Alexander, king of the Scots, was residing in England, he did homage to this Louis at London³ (as is reported), in the same form as the barons of England had done to him; and Louis himself and all the barons of England swore upon the holy gospels, that they would never enter into any agreement for peace or truce with the king of England, unless the king of the Scots were included. Subsequent occurrences, however, will prove that this was not observed to the full.

In this same year, upon the seventeenth of the kalends of August [16th July], our lord pope Innocent the third of holy memory departed from this world, for the Lord had called him, being in the nineteenth year of his pontificate. His successor was Honorius, bishop and cardinal, who succeeded on the thirteenth of the kalends of August [20th July], a man venerable as well from his learning as his maturity of age.

In this same year died Henry, abbot of Rievaulx, at Ruhford, and there he was buried; he was succeeded in the rule of that establishment by William, abbot of Melrose, upon the second of the kalends of September [31st Aug.]. In his stead Ralph, the cellarer of Melrose, was elected to be the abbot of that house on the eighteenth of the kalends of October [14th Sept.], and he received the benediction at the hands of Hugh, bishop of Dunkeld, on the third of the kalends of October [29th Sept.], at Melrose. Richard, abbot of Newbottle, resigned his office on the sixth of the kalends of August [27th July], and was succeeded by Adam, the cellarer of the same house, on the thirteenth of the kalends of September [20th Aug.]. On the seventeenth of the kalends of November [17th Oct.], in the same year, died John, king of England, at Newark; his bowels, having been removed, were buried at the abbey of Crokestun, but his body was conveyed to Worcester, and there interred in the monastery.

² William, third earl of Salisbury, was a natural son of Henry the second, by Rosamond his concubine.

At this time the pope sent into England a cardinal a latere, whose name was Galo, that he might render assistance to king John and his heirs, in the protection of their liberties against Louis and all other the king's enemies, having received the papal authority for this purpose. This he did with the greatest constancy. For upon the death of the king (as we have mentioned) Galo took with him Henry, archbishop of Dublin, and Peter, bishop of Winchester, and they crowned as king the late king's son and heir, Henry, a lad of seven years of age, at Worcester. Upon the same day the abbot of Westminster and the prior of Canterbury appealed to the apostolic see against the said cardinal, for the preservation of their liberties, touching the matter of the coronation. Henry of Westminster objected, because the ceremony had been performed elsewhere than in Westminster; and the prior of Canterbury protested that no one ought to have officiated except the lord archbishop of Canterbury; and that thus the liberties and privileges of their respective churches had been violated. Because they thus appealed, the cardinal excommunicated them both; but they did not consider themselves as excommunicated persons, nor did they withdraw the appeals which they had made. Next Galo pronounced the sentence of excommunication against the said Louis and all his supporters, and declared that it proceeded from the pope himself; moreover he included in this same sentence our lord the king of the Scots and all his nobility, and did not hesitate to place the lands of all of them under interdict. And yet this sentence of excommunication and interdict was not immediately observed in England, nor was it denounced in Scotland until nearly the ensuing year; for the cardinal (in virtue of the apostolic authority with which he was invested,) entirely absolved all those who had done homage or any fealty to the said Louis, provided they would return to their own lawful lord, the new king.

In the same year, Conrad, abbot of Clairvaux, was translated to be abbot of Citeaux; and in his stead William,¹ abbot of the monastery of Nargun, was elected abbot of Clairvaux.

In the western part of Scotland, which is called Galloway, there appeared a change in the form of the moon, marvellous beyond belief, and such as our age had not hitherto witnessed. William, abbot of Glenluce, a man worthy of all credit, and a monk of holy conversation, sent an account of it in writing to the lord prior and the holy convent of Melrose; and afterwards, when he visited Melrose, he gave a detailed narrative of what had happened, corresponding in every respect with his previously-written communication. I was present among the other auditors, and made the request, and heard and wondered at his narrative. His letter was to this effect:—

“ To those venerable persons in Christ, our lord A. the prior of Melrose, and to the convent of the same place, brother William, the unworthy minister of the poor in Christ who are at Glenluce, wishes eternal health in the Lord.

“ As it is impossible that He who is the Truth should be deceived, so in like manner is it all the more certain, that what His mouth has predicted is in part fulfilled already, and that what still remains to be accomplished shall of a surety come to pass. For the lips of the Truth have declared that ‘ there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring,’ etc. [Luke xxi. 25.] Since, then, nothing which occurs upon the globe happens without a cause, it is clear that the greater they are the greater is the cause in which they originate. I have taken care therefore, with all the brevity which I can employ, to transmit to you, holy brethren, an account of a great wonder, or rather of many and great wonders, which appeared of late in the parts of Galloway. Nor should I have ventured to have communicated this account to men so great and so venerable, were it not that I have the most conclusive evidence of what I narrate, the evidence of those very persons who saw these wonders with their own eyes, and gave a truthful and detailed account of them with their own lips in my presence, and in the presence of many others.

“ It happened, then, that a certain convert of our order, a man sober, sedate, pure-minded, and of approved religion, was on a journey, towards the dusk of the evening upon the day of St. Ambrose the bishop [4th April],¹ the day after Palm Sunday, being the day before the nones of April, when the moon was thirteen days old, and lo! as this convert was looking at the moon, (which was at this time full and round,) at that very time he saw, as it were, a black and dusky rope cutting the moon into two halves. The blackness of this rope diffused itself over that half of the moon which was towards the north, and made it become darker and duskier than the other part; whereupon, in the twinkling of an eye, that half which had lost its colour appeared to cut itself off and separate itself from the other portion, from which it became detached about the eighth part of a mile; and so great was the violence with which that paler half of the moon was separated and plucked asunder from the other, that it emitted sparks, like a dragon when it is flying through the sky. Some little delay now occurred, after which that paler part of the moon gradually and slowly advanced nearer and nearer to the other half; at one time drawing itself back, as if in fear, and again driven onwards, as if by constraint. Just, however, as these two parts of the moon were about to coalesce, a cloud intervened which shrouded both of them, and the vision disappeared. A gust of wind, however, swept the cloud aside, and the moon once more emerged from under it, and now it appeared to have increased to the bulk of three moons; immediately this increase in its bulk expanded itself over the whole heavens, and then assumed the form of a beautiful castle, the walls of which were amply provided with towers and battlements. At this sight, so unusual and so astounding, not only the convert but his servant also began to fear and tremble; and this latter said to the former, 'Master, what is the meaning of all this? Has the day of judgment arrived, think you?' The other answered, 'Not so, my son; but these things are the wonders of the Almighty God, who, according to his pleasure, works signs, and prodigies, and miracles.' The servant remarked, 'I have frequently been told that these changes in the moon's shape are produced by witches and magicians, and women who are enchantresses.' The other replied, 'It is not so, my son; we ought rather to believe that these things portend something wonderful and fearful, which is about to befall the race of mankind.'

"But now the moon had put off the shape of a castle, and assumed that of a very large and beautiful ship; on board of which there appeared only one figure, a very tall man, who seemed to be the sailor. This ship hoisted and spread abroad her sail, and so sailed away with the greatest rapidity towards Ireland, taking the direction of the Isle of Man. Next the moon put off the form of a ship and resumed that of a large castle, fearful to look upon; and on this occasion there was displayed in the castle a royal standard, such as is borne in the army of the king when he goes forth to battle; and, what is more extraordinary still, the pendants or little streamers which hang down from the ends of the banners, in this which now appeared seemed to move and flutter as if by a breath of wind. Some little time afterwards the whole fabric of the castle vanished and the moon resumed her natural form and pursued her wonted course. Presently, however, a little dusky tower, provided with turrets of the smallest size, appeared upon the moon for a very brief space of time, and then disappeared. The moon seemed to have suffered some damage from these frequent annoyances and violent and sudden changes; she was troubled and saddened and distressed, and continued pale and discoloured; at length, however, she recovered her former hue and became herself again.

"It is for you, then, holy men, to decide whether such an unusual appearance as this is, whether such a fearful portent, such an astounding miracle, ought to be passed over in silence. And if He, who created not only the moon, but the whole fabric of the universe, did not spare the exceeding beauty of the moon, which is a type of the elements of the firmament, and in herself represents the hidden meaning of the earth and the sea, but suffered the moon herself to be dishonoured by undergoing a transformation so great and so fearful, as a warning to the whole human race—what shall be the fate of those persons for whose sakes these tokens were foreshown, if they refuse to return from the way of perdition in which they are walking, disregarding alike the fear of God, the dread of hell, and every other consideration?”

A. D. 1217. Richard de Marisco was consecrated bishop of Durham. In the month of July in this same year, a battle between France and England, such as our times have not heard of, was fought at sea. For while Louis and a large number of his troops were residing in London, the English blockaded all the seaports, and guarded the sea-coasts with the greatest strictness, in order that no supplies might arrive from France. The French, however, arrived with a large body of troops and a considerable fleet, and in the first engagement at sea they obtained the victory, and got possession of the coast, as they wished: but, God so deciding, a second battle having taken place in the middle of the ocean, the English (who had made a great levy of ships and sailors) were conquerors. Here they slew that arch-pirate, Eustace¹ the Monk, and a countless number of others, the funeral rites of whose bodies they entrusted to the fishes of the sea, and whose exequies were celebrated by the monsters of the deep. The more noble of the number they kept in close-custody, in the hope of a firmer peace and agreement. The names of the more important of the captives are these,—Robert de Curtenei, William de Baris, Ralph de Tornellis, William de Ichri, William de Pessei, Perun de Johanris, Thomas de Cusei, Aelrad de Croizillis, Anselm de Romoyni, Gallon de Munceni, Nevellunus de Araz, William de Mariscis, and many others. Of the prisoners six score and five were knights, seven score and six were esquires, thirty-three were crossbowmen, eight hundred and thirty-three were foot soldiers. R. abbot of Wardon, sent this calculation, and the names of the nobility to William, abbot of Rievaux.

The abbey of Kilinros was founded by Malcolm, earl of Fife, to which abbey the convent was sent on the seventh of the kalends of March [23d Feb.] from Kinlos, along with Hugh, the first abbot of Kilinros, who had formerly been prior of Kinlos. And so that convent came to Kilinros upon the fifteenth of the kalends of April [18th March].

The archbishop of Suris, and the abbots of Citeaux and Clairvaux, were sent into England to establish a peace between Louis and the new king of England, Henry. In order to preserve the dignity of their order, these abbots appealed to the apostolic see against cardinal G[ualo], because that legate demanded, by way of exaction, procurations from the Cistercian order, contrary to the privileges which had been granted to that order by the see of Rome. Moreover, he had placed the monasteries of their monks under interdict; he had suspended their abbots and convents, and had declared them to be excommunicate; and furthermore he had caused discipline to be publicly inflicted upon their bare flesh, before the church-doors, because they had communicated with the rebels; and this he did, having previously extorted from each of them an oath that they would submit to the judgment of the church, and to whatever the pope or himself should command. He had also enjoined the accustomed penances to abbots and convents, and would scarce concede to them the grace of absolution. Therefore it was that (as I have mentioned) they appealed against him, for he carried himself thus cruelly towards the Cistercian order; but upon this occasion they experienced no favour. For our lord the pope had granted to this legate a degree of authority hitherto unknown and unprecedented; for he had the power, so to speak, of doing to the clergy throughout England, Scotland, and Wales, whatever entered his mind; he might translate bishops and abbots, and other prelates of churches, and clerks, and depose them, and substitute others, and suspend and excommunicate them, and absolve them. And, what was more important still, he might deprive of their privileges even the monks of the Cistercian¹ order.

Walter,² the abbot of the new monastery at Citeaux, died, during the time of the general chapter, and in his room Henry, prior of La Roche,³ was elected. In this general chapter two abbots and five priors of Wales were removed from their offices, and banished from their own houses, on account of the excesses which they had committed against this said cardinal; these were the abbots of Albalanda and Strata Florida.

In the month of May, Alexander, by the grace of God the king of the Scots, assembled his entire army, and laid siege to the castle of Midford; and after he had continued before it for a week, he returned home. Philip de Ullecotes and H. de Balliol threatened that they would have their revenge upon the king of the Scots, by ravaging his land. Hearing this, our lord the king collected his entire army, that is to say, of English, Scots, and Galwegians, with the greatest expedition, upon the third of the nones of July [5th July], and marched again into Northumberland.

The lady Eva⁴ at Galloway died on the third of the ides of June [11th June]. Helyas, formerly abbot of Rievaulx, was elected abbot of Revesby in the month of December.

It is reported that in the month of March in this same year a rebellion broke out in the island of Rie against the lord Louis. For some of those persons who had sworn against the king of ¹ It will not be forgotten that Melrose was a foundation of this order.

² The succession of the priors of Citeaux, as given by the Benedictine editors of the Gallia Christiana, iv. 991, 992, does not agree with the statement of our chronicler.

³ No abbot of the name of Henry occurs in the list given in the Gall. Christ. xii. 468.

England, that is to say, William Longsword, the brother of king John, and William, the younger marshal of England, and their adherents, unexpectedly rose against Louis in this island. But, by God's providence, which never deserts those who trust in Him, a considerable number of ships which had been sent into England by Philip, the king of France, the father of this Louis, at that very time, by a strange coincidence, touched at this island, and on their arrival he was delivered from custody, and his enemies were compelled to consult their own safety by flight.

Upon the kalends of June [1st June] a battle was fought at Lincoln, between the supporters of Louis, the son of the king of France, and those who held with Henry, the new king of England. With the former sided the larger portion of the whole knighthood of England and France, of whom the following were the more illustrious:—The marshal of France, with his retainers; the earl of Perches,¹ who is said to have been the uncle of this Louis, and a kinsman to each of the two kings, (of England, namely, and of France,) with his retainers; and very many others of the nobility of France, with a countless number of knights, men-at-arms, retainers, crossbowmen, and foot-soldiers. On Louis's side also were nearly all the nobles and barons of England. On the part of the new king Henry stood this cardinal G[ualo], who, clothed in his sacred robes, excommunicated, by the authority of Almighty God and our lord the pope, all who favoured the interests of Louis. With him were the archbishop of York, and seven bishops, namely those of Worcester, Hereford, Salisbury, Lincoln, Bath, Exeter, and Winchester; the two Williams, the marshals of England, William Longsword, earl of Salisbury, and the earl of Albemarle, Robert de Vipont, Brian de Insula, Geoffrey de Neville, the chamberlain of England, and Richard, the son of king John. So all those persons who were on the side of Louis, being bowed down with the heavy burden of excommunication, were captured in this battle by a few, not without a miracle, and imprisoned in the city of Lincoln. It is much to be lamented that the noble earl of Perche died a cruel and a violent death in this battle, after having defended himself for a long time.

On the seventh of the ides of September [7th Sept.], in this same year, the general army of the whole of England was collected near London, as well as a considerable portion of the soldiery of France; and by the mediation of the cardinal G[ualo] (so frequently mentioned), and the nobility of the two kingdoms, a reconciliation was effected between Louis, the son of the king of France, and Henry, the new king of England, upon the understanding, however, that ten thousand pounds should be paid to this Louis, to meet the expenses which he had incurred. The said Louis and his fellow-soldiers went, ungirded and barefoot, from his pavilion to the tent of the cardinal, and prayed for absolution; and this coveted absolution he at last obtained, but not until he had previously made oath that he would abide by the sentence of the church, and that within a specified period he would rid England of himself and his followers. As for the barons and knights who had been taken prisoners, and put into ward on either side, they were all of them absolved, and freed, and delivered (as were all the English) from the homage which they had performed to the said Louis. But as for the king of Scotland, he and all his earls, and barons, knights and nobles, bishops and prelates of the entire realm of Scotland, were interdicted and excommunicated.

In this same year Alexander, king of Scotland, collected his army, and advanced towards England; but when he arrived at Jedewurth, he heard of the peace which had been concluded between Louis and the king of England, and thereupon he disbanded his army, and remained there during the month of September. Our lord Alexander, the king of Scotland, was absolved from the bond of excommunication by the lord archbishop of York, and by the lord bishop of Durham, at Berwick, upon the kalends of December [1st Dec.], by authority of the legate, who was resident in England, and the third day afterwards the mother of the said king was absolved by the lord bishop of Durham. As soon as the archbishop had absolved the king, he proceeded on his journey towards Carlisle, that he might receive the seisin of the castle by mandate of the king of Scotland, for the use of the king of England. At this same time, while the king was on his way towards England, the whole church of Scotland having been placed under interdict, ceased from the celebration of divine service, with the exception of the white monks, who still celebrated, according to the privileges which they had received from the apostolic see. Upon his arrival at Northampton¹ the king was received with the greatest respect, as well by the said legate as by the new king of England, and there he did homage to the king of England for the earldom of Huntingdon, and the other lands which his predecessors had held of the kings of England, on the Saturday next before Christmas-day [23d Dec.].

A. D. 1218. In the beginning of January, William Malvecine, lord bishop of St. Andrew's, returned into his own bishopric from the general council at Rome. About the end of the same month the same legate, who yet lingered in England, sent William, the prior of Durham, and master Walter de Wisebech, the archdeacon of the East Riding, to absolve the church of Scotland, its priests and people (with the exception of the bishops and prelates), from the bond of excommunication and the interdict. Commencing at Berwick, they went round Scotland, and perambulated it. They arrived at Edinburgh to visit the king, and there they received from him and his people an oath that they would abide by the judgment of the church, and the commands of our lord the pope. Thence they went into the very heart of Scotland, even as far as Aberdeen. On their return they paid a visit at Lundors, and there the bedchamber in which the prior and his monks were asleep caught fire through the carelessness and wasteful expenditure of the guestmasters. The prior was nearly suffocated with the fire and smoke, and hardly escaped with his life : he did not long survive this accident, for, though he reached Coldingham, he was then nearly exhausted, and he died there upon the second of the ides of May [14th May].

In this same year, at the Incarnation of our Lord [25th March], master W[alter] de Wisebech, in virtue of the authority delegated to him by the said legate, commanded that all the monks of the Cistercian order throughout Scotland should wholly cease from the celebration of divine service. These abbots, that is to say, Ralph, abbot of Melrose, Adam of Newbottle, Alexander of Cupre, Ralph of Kinlos, and Hugh of St. Serfs, having placed all that they had under the peace of God, and the protection of our lord the pope, went to the said legate at York, where, after many prayers, and through the intercession of many suppliants, they obtained for themselves (but with difficulty) the favour of absolution. In the meantime this same W[alter] de Wisebech, along with numerous clerks and prelates, held a council at Berwick on Palm Sunday [8th April] and the day following, in which he denounced as excommunicate the said monks within the realm of Scotland, and all who communicated with them. But these monks did as they had done before ; they appealed to the presence of our lord the pope, as well against the said legate as against W[alter]; and renewing the application which had been made by the lord abbot of Citeaux for the integrity of the order, they considered that denunciation as invalid. When he heard this, the said legate grew exceeding wrathful, and swore to the prelates who were in company with him that he would show no favour whatever either to them or their convents, until he should have been assured by the testimony of their bishops or deans that these very convents had submitted to the interdict. Upon the receipt of letters from their abbots, the monks refrained for some time from either celebrating divine service, or from entering the church; until, by the command of the legate, they received absolution at the hand of lord W[illiam], bishop of St. Andrews, they having first made oath that they would abide by the judgment of the church, and the commands of our lord the pope ; their order and privileges being saved.

In the same year, in the month of May, Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, returned from the general council, and reached England; and on his arrival all rejoiced as if he had been an angel of peace, and an affectionate father and pastor, and again and again they sung, “ Blessed be he who cometh in the name of the Lord.”

This year, upon the departure from England of the said G[ualo] the legate, there came thither one Pandulf, a clerk of the see of Rome, at that time the legate appointed for England, and bishop-elect of Norwich. W[illiam], archdeacon of Buckingham, was elected bishop of Worcester. The bishop of Brechin died, and was succeeded by Gregory, the archdeacon of the said bishopric. In the same year died Otho, the emperor of Germany, and was succeeded by Frederick, called the Child of Apulia. The earl of Burgundy died also; and Simon, earl of Montfort, was killed. May their souls rest in peace!

On the third of the nones of October [7th Oct.] died Henry, abbot of Kelso, in whose place Richard, the prior of the same house, succeeded on the fourteenth of the kalends of November [19th Oct.]. In the same year nearly all the abbots of England, Wales, and Scotland, set out for the general chapter at the command of the lord abbot of Citeaux, as they had to discuss matters of importance. From this chapter the lord of Citeaux, and he of Clairvaux, and seven others, their fellow-abbots, proceeded to Rome, there to lay their complaint of the injuries done to their order by the said cardinal G[ualo]; and there they fully obtained their object against the said cardinal, by the help of God, and the assistance of His mother the ever Virgin Mary, the advocate and especial patroness of that order. Moreover, upon this very occasion the same Conrad, abbot of Citeaux, was elected and consecrated by the pope as bishop of Portua, and furthermore was made a cardinal, to the honour of God and our order, and as a token of the defeat of that same cardinal G[ualo]. He was succeeded in the office of abbot of Citeaux by Gaucher,¹ abbot of Longpont. There set out from Scotland for the apostolic see, three bishops following; namely, Walter, bishop of Glasgow, Brice, bishop of Moray, and Adam, bishop of Caithness, to procure their absolution. They returned in the following year.

A.D. 1219. Adam de Colville died. William de Valoniis died at Kelso, and his body was carried to Melrose (contrary to the wishes of the monks of that house), and there honourably buried in the chapter-house of the monks, near the burial-place of his father. G.² Avenel died, and his body was interred in the same chapter-house. In the kalends of June [1st June] died Ralph, abbot of Melrose, and he was succeeded in the government of the house by Adam, abbot of Newbottle, on the eighth of the ides of August [6th Aug.]. Richard, master of the converts of Newbottle, succeeded him. Henry, abbot of Newminster, died at Pipewell, and was succeeded by Robert, the master of the converts of the same house.

That celebrated city of the pagans, Damietta by name, was taken by Christ alone, after having been besieged for nearly three years by the Christian army, and it was entrusted, by a great miracle, to the keeping of the Christians on the nones of November [5th Nov.].

How Damietta was taken, A.D. 1219.

“H.,³ the humble master of the house of the Teutonic knights in Jerusalem, sends greeting to the reverend Cardinal L. by the title of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem.

“Let it be known to your eminence, that Almighty God has vouchsafed to be merciful to the Christian army, which had been long worn out, and has wonderfully and mercifully delivered up to those who are in exile for His Name the city of Damietta, without any wound being inflicted or battle fought, so that this cannot be attributed to the deserts of any one, but solely to His own glory. Know, then, that God's mercy wrought in this open manner for us about the fore-named city. Such a terrible mortality broke out among its inhabitants, that the living could not bury the dead. The survivors were so oppressed with the burden of disease, that when we first gained an entrance into the city we found more than three thousand human corpses lying in the street, like so many dead dogs. Our men, during the silence of midnight, were admitted into the city by the connivance (as we believe) of some of the garrison; and the legate sent his messengers, who secured many of the towers, and took prisoners a large body of the infidels. Many others took refuge in the towers which were more strongly fortified, and waited therein until day should dawn. And at sunrise, upon the nones of November [5th Nov.], all the Saracens in Damietta surrendered themselves, and gave up (entirely, but unwillingly) the city into the power of the Christians. In the confusion incident upon the first taking possession of the city, many evil-disposed persons got in, and privately carried away an enormous sum of money. The leaders of the army perceiving what great things God had done, by common consent agreed that they would collect into one mass the whole of the gold and silver; and the lord legate excommunicated all who kept back any portion of it, unless he repented by making restitution thereof. We are not sufficiently well informed to specify the exact amount of this money; for when this present letter was being written, the sum total had not been calculated. But the Saracens whom we have captured tell us (what we ourselves know by inspection) that the amount of treasure which has been discovered is incalculable; and the general wish is, that it should be divided among the army at large. We are apprehensive that the love of this money will lead to much theft. We have also to inform you that before the city of Damietta was taken, the citizens declared that they were so exhausted that they could no longer hold out. The soldan, however, encouraged them in friendly manner, promising assistance, to render which he exposed his troops to considerable danger. Two days before the surrender of the city, he sent five hundred picked men from his army, and attempted to throw them into it. When they arrived from the soldan's army, they wished to pass through our troops, near the engine which is called the Trebuchet of St. John, but God's providence caused them to miss their way. At that part of the siege which was under the care of the king of Jerusalem, two hundred men, armed with swords and scimitars, attempted to force their way into the town, and they put to flight the watchers who were on duty at the fosse where they wished to enter; for the king and his soldiers were spending that night on the sand. God's grace assisting us, the alarm grew stronger; and all the pilgrims rushing to the spot, one hundred and forty of these assailants were killed, forty taken prisoners, and only one hundred and twenty entered the city. Their companions were slain, and they, having been captured the third day afterwards in the town, are henceforth condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Such of the others as escaped imprisonment and the sword returned to the soldan, and told him what had happened. On the night which followed the day upon which we took Damietta, the army of the soldan struck its tents and removed further up the Nile; but we know not where they now are, or what are their plans.

² This was probably Gervase Avenel; concerning whom see Morton's Monastic Annals, p. 274; and Fordun, ii. 43.

“ We have further to acquaint you, that previous to the capture of Damietta, the soldan’s messengers had a conference with us, and expressed their willingness to give up to us the whole of the Holy Land, excepting only the two castles of Crac and Muntreal, and even for them they are ready to pay an annual rent to the Christians, as long as peace should continue. Moreover, that all the Christian captives ¹ ”

A. D. 1220. On the nones of April [5th April] died Richard, abbot of Newbottle, and was succeeded by Richard, the prior of the same house. On the morrow of the octaves of Peter and Paul [7th July] the reliques of the blessed Thomas the martyr were translated; and in the parts on this side of the sea it was commanded that this day should be held as a feast. Upon the fourth of the nones of November [2d Nov.], Ralph, abbot of Kinlos, a man full of good days, departed in a holy old age from this world to heaven, as we trust; he was succeeded in the care of his government by Robert, the first abbot of Der, in whose stead, as abbot of Der, was elected Alexander, prior of Kinlos. In the land of our redemption, Robert Curzun² departed from this life to the land of divine promise, as we believe; he was a man full of the catholic faith, ornamented with virtues and wisdom; and (as those who return from thence report) by his intercession with God, many and great miracles are performed.

A. D. 1221. Master James, a canon of St. Victor at Paris, the penitentiary of the apostolic see, the legate for Scotland and Ireland, held a general council at Perth, to which he summoned the prelates of the whole realm. It continued for four days, the first of which was on the octaves of the Purification [9th Feb.].

On the Saturday next before the feast of St. John the Baptist [19th June], our lord Alexander, the king of Scotland, married at York the daughter³ of John, and the sister of Henry, king of England; and after the nuptials had been celebrated with the exceeding splendour which was fitting such an occasion, he conducted her into Scotland, to the great joy of all the inhabitants of both kingdoms.

On the nones of August [2d Aug.] died Richard, abbot of Kelso; he was succeeded by Herbert Maunsel, the secretary of that same house. Philip de Stichil died.

² See Ciaconius, ii. 37.

³ See Fœd. i. 165. Fordun (ii. 43) incorrectly places this event in 1220.

In this same year, by the consent of the kings of England and Scotland, and by the advice of the nobility of both realms, the lady Margaret¹ (the daughter of William, king of Scotland, of holy memory, and the sister of our lord king Alexander, was given in marriage to Herbert de Burc,² the justiciary of England and Scotland.

In this year, the famous city of Damietta,³ of which possession had recently been obtained by the Christians, having been too carelessly and inertly defended by them, was again besieged by the pagans, and entirely taken out of their hands, on the eve of the decollation of St. John the Baptist [28th Aug.]. We do not know why this so happened, or by what judgment of God it was brought about; more especially as in this city the beauty of the worship of God had already begun to be regarded. For a new bishop, who had been ordained to that city, had an income of one thousand talents, and in it there were also forty canons, each of whom had a yearly revenue of one hundred talents.

A. D. 1222. Brice, bishop of Moray, died, and was succeeded by master Andrew de Moray. Alexander, abbot of Der, died upon the eighth of the ides of September [6th Sept.], when he was upon his journey to attend the general council at the Valley of the blessed Mary. In returning from the same chapter, Geoffrey, abbot of Dundrenan, died in the house of Alba-ripa.

In this same year, that father of holy memory, and that excellent pastor, Adam, bishop of Caithness, formerly abbot of Melrose, and a true monk of the Cistercian order, together with a fellow-monk of his, named Serlo, a deacon of Newbottle, was permitted happily to attain unto the brotherhood of the heavenly citizens (as we trust), having passed through the triumph of manifold suffering. For as, while upon earth, he was allowed to become a partaker of the martyrdom of the saints, so may we be permitted to believe that he was not deprived of their society in heaven; the more especially as he was content to suffer death for the sake of justice, namely, for the claim of tithes according to the use of ecclesiastical authority, and, like a good shepherd, he chose rather to lay down his life for his sheep than to permit the flock which had been entrusted to his charge to continue any longer in an inveterate error. And since it is the cause, rather than the suffering, which makes the martyr, so, in his case, the cause was plain and just, the suffering most cruel; and, therefore, to withhold from him the honour and the merit which he has earned would be to do him injury, the more especially as he, in his own person, is well known to have borne the sufferings of many martyrs. He endured cruel threats and frequent taunts; he was exposed to crushing blows and bloody wounds; he endured the staves of St. James, and the stones of St. Stephen; and, at length, the flames of St. Laurence presented him as a burnt-offering to the Lord. Thus he suffered martyrdom at his episcopal manor, which in the English tongue is called Haukirc, on Sunday, the third of the ides of September [11th Sept.]. After the flames had been extinguished, his body was discovered under a pile of stones, entire, though broiled with the fire and discoloured from the blows inflicted by the stones; and it was committed to the grave, with the honour which was so fully its due, in the baptismal church, before the holy altar. Thus the faithful daughter received into the protection of her own bosom that father whom his wicked and unnatural sons had so cruelly put to death, there to rest until he shall arise in glory to a happy resurrection.

Geoffrey, abbot of Dundrainan, died, at Alba-ripa, as he was returning from the general chapter. P. de Valoniis, with the consent of our lord the king, took to wife¹ the widow of Walter de Lindsey, but against his own will, because they were connected in the third or fourth degree of relationship or affinity: whereupon this P. went to Rome, and (as he himself states) obtained from our lord the pope a dispensation from remaining in the marriage which he had contracted. Robert, archdeacon of Glasgow, of holy memory, died at London while on his way back from Rome; and his body was honourably buried there in the cemetery of the blessed apostle Paul. He was succeeded in the archdeaconry by Thomas, parson of Lillisclive, who died in the same year; his successor was the clerk Thomas, who afterwards became the chancellor of our lord the king of Scotland.

A. D. 1223. Philip, king of France, being full of days, died in a good old age, and in the catholic faith, upon the second of the ides of July [14th July], in the forty-third year of his reign. I do not know how old he was. He left, by will, fifty thousand pounds (according to the calculation of Paris,) to the temple at Jerusalem, and other fifty thousand pounds to the hospital at Jerusalem, and other fifty thousand to John de Brienne, who was at that time king of Jerusalem; gifts worthy of a king. Louis, his son, succeeded him in his kingdom, at that time a bold and manly knight. Upon the kalends of February [1st Feb.] died William, abbot of Rievaulx, and was succeeded by Roger, abbot of Wardon, whose office at Wardon William, the prior of that place, was appointed to fill. Robert Macussal, sub-prior of Dundrainan, was created abbot of that same house, on the vigil of the Epiphany [5th Jan.]. About the same time, Herbert, monk of Cupre, was made abbot of Der. Adam, abbot of Holmcultram, resigned his office, and was succeeded by Ralph, abbot of Jugum Dei in Ireland; in whose place in Ireland was appointed John, the cellarer of Glenluce.

John de Brienne, king of Jerusalem, came into England for the purpose of discussing various important matters with the king of England and his nobility, at London. Isabella, the daughter of William, that king of good memory, and the sister of Alexander, the king of Scotland, returned from the wardship of the king of England, being still unmarried.

A. D. 1226. Louis, king of France, died ; and also R[ichard] de Marisco, bishop of Durham.

A. D. 1227. The venerable pope Honorius died, the father and the protector of the Cistercian order ; may his soul live in glory ! His successor was pope Gregory, who had formerly been bishop of Ostia.

Upon Whitsunday [30th May], Alexander, the king of Scotland, invested with the arms of knighthood John the Scot, earl of Huntingdon, his kinsman, being the son of earl David, as well as many other of the nobility, at the castle of Roxburgh.

Thomas, who was the king's chancellor, and the archdeacon of Glasgow, died ; he was succeeded in the archdeaconry by master Hugh de Pottun ; and master Matthew Scot was made the king's chancellor.

William, the son of John, the lord of Hunum, died ; his nephew, John de Laundells, succeeded him.

A. D. 1228. Richard, bishop of Salisbury, was translated to Durham. Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, died.

A. D. 1229. The abbey of St. Edward, of Balmorinac, was founded by king Alexander and his mother ; and the convent was sent thither from Melrose, with Alan its abbot, upon the day of St. Lucy the Virgin [13th Dec.]. There were consecrated Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, and Roger, bishop of London, and Hugh, bishop of Ely, and Robert, of Salisbury.

A. D. 1230. Simon de Rise was elected abbot of Rufford in the chapter-house of Melrose, upon the day of the conversion of St. Paul [25th Jan.].

Malcolm, earl of Fife, died, and was buried in the church of St. Servanus, of Kilenross, of which he had been the founder. His nephew Malcolm, the son of his brother, succeeded him ; he afterwards married the daughter of Leulin. At this time¹ was the first entrance into Scotland of the Jacobin friars, and of the monks De Valle Olerum. Master Richard de Graunt was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury ; and master Roger Niger, bishop of London ; and Roger, abbot of St. Edmund's, bishop of Ely.

A. D. 1231. Thomas, the brother of Alan of Galloway, earl of Athol, died, and was buried in the abbey of Cupre. The friars Minors now came into Scotland for the first time.

Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and John, earl of Caithness, was killed and burnt in his house ; a punishment which he had merited at God's hands, for he had inflicted the like injury upon the venerable bishop Adam.

A. D. 1232. Walter, bishop of Glasgow, died in the twenty-fourth year of his episcopate ; after whom, William, the king's chancellor, was elected. William de Ramsey, the abbot of St. Servanus, died ; his successor was Hugh, master of the converts at Melrose, who was elected upon the day of the conversion of St. Mary [25th Aug.]. Ralph, earl of Chester, died, and was succeeded by his nephew, John the Scot, the earl of Huntingdon, who, a few years previously, had married the daughter of Leulin.

Patrick,¹ the venerable earl of Dunbar, invited his sons and daughters, his kinsmen and his neighbours, to spend the festival of our Lord's Nativity happily together. When four days had been thus occupied, he was seized with a severe illness, whereupon he summoned A. abbot of Melrose, his friend and kinsman, and received extreme unction and the dress of monk at his hands; and thus, bidding a last farewell to all, he died upon the day of St. Sylvester [31st Jan.] (after having held the earldom for fifty years), and was buried in the church of St. Mary at Hecclis. He was succeeded by his son Patrick, a sturdy knight, the king's² nephew.

Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated.

A. D. 1233. Ermergerdis of good memory, the mother of king Alexander, and the queen of William, king of Scotland, died on the third of the ides of February [11th Feb.], after having been married forty-seven years; and she was buried in the abbey of St. Edward, of Balmorinac, which she herself had founded.

The church of St. Mary at Newbotel was dedicated by Andrew, bishop of Moray, upon the third of the ides of March [13th March]. Also, the church of Abberbrohoc was dedicated upon the eighth of the ides of May [8th May]. Also, the church of St. Mary of Cupre was dedicated upon the ides of May [15th May].

Gilbert, abbot of Glenluce, resigned his office in the chapter-house of Melrose; and there he made his profession. Alan of Galloway gave his daughter to John de Bailiol in marriage, and also his sister to Walter Biseth.

The canon Clement, one of the order of the Friars Preachers, was elected to the bishopric of Dunblain, and was consecrated by William, bishop of St. Andrew's, on the day of the translation of St. Cuthbert [4th Sept.], at Wedale. Also, William, bishop of Glasgow, was consecrated by Andrew, bishop of Moray, on the Sunday after the Nativity of the blessed Mary [11th Sept.], in his church of Glasgow. William, abbot of Holmcultran, resigned his office, and was succeeded by Gilbert, the master of the converts of the same house. William Cumin, earl of Buwhan, the founder of the abbey of Der, died.

A. D. 1234. Alan, the son of Roland, lord of Galloway, and constable of Scotland, died, and was buried at Dundraynan, leaving behind him three daughters, his heirs, and one base-born³ son, who, during the lifetime of his father, had married the daughter of the king of Man. His daughters were thus married: the eldest married Roger de Quincy, earl of Winchester; the second, John de Baylol; the husband of the third was the son of the earl of Albemarle. Among them was divided the land of this earl Alan. But the inhabitants of that land, preferring one master rather than several, went to our lord the king, with the request that he himself would accept the lordship of that inheritance; but the king was too just to do this. Hereupon the Galwegians were angry above measure, and prepared for war; moreover, they devastated with fire and sword some of the royal lands contiguous to themselves; an action which afterwards redounded to their own loss, as will presently appear.

Walran, abbot of Dere, died; and in his stead, Hugh, the venerable prior of Melrose, was elected.

A. D. 1235. W. bishop of Whithern, died; and on the first Sunday in Lent [25th Feb.], Gilbert, master of the novices of Melrose, and formerly abbot of Glenluce, was elected bishop, as well by the clergy as by the entire population of Galloway, with the exception of the prior and convent of Whitherne. But upon the Sunday on which is sung "Oculi mei" [18th March], the said prior and his convent chose Odo, formerly abbot of Deretonsal;¹ accompanied by whom they forthwith went to Walter de Gray, archbishop of York, demanding from him the office of consecration. They did not prevail, however, for he had heard of the former election. Having listened to the pleadings on both sides, he rejected Odo, and consecrated the aforesaid Gilbert, monk of Melrose, to be bishop in the cathedral church of York, upon the Sunday next before the Nativity of the blessed Mary [2d Sept.].

After Hugh, the elect of Der, had presided over that church for a single year, he returned to the monastery of Melrose; and there he resigned his office, influenced no less by bodily infirmity than by the coldness of that locality. Shortly after he had been restored to the office of prior, he departed in faith to the Lord. Robert, a monk of the same house, was made abbot of Der. Robert Grostet was consecrated to Lincoln. Henry, king of England, married Alienor.

In the same year, on the Sunday next before the feast of the blessed Mary Magdalene [15th July], our lord the king collected an army, and entered into Galloway. Having reached a spot which appeared at first sight to be convenient for the purpose, he determined that he would there pitch his tents, for the day was now drawing towards the evening. The Galwegians, however, (who had all day long been lurking among the mountains,) knew the place better; and, trusting to their local acquaintance with its difficulties, they offered the king battle. In truth, the spot was filled with bogs, which were covered all over with grass and flowers, amongst which the larger portion of the royal army had involved itself. At the beginning of the battle, the earl of Ross, named Makinsagat,² came up, and attacked the enemies in the rear; and as soon as they perceived this they took to flight, and retreated into the woods and mountains, but they were followed up by the earl and several others, who put many of them to the sword, and harassed them as long as the daylight lasted. On the next day the king,³ acting upon his accustomed humanity, extended his peace to as many as came to him; and so the surviving Galwegians, with ropes round their necks, accepted his offer. The bastard T. (whom we have already mentioned), and Gilroth, who incited him to his rebellion, went over to Ireland.

Having obtained this victory, the king, finding that matters of importance demanded his presence in other parts of his realm, departed from this district; but he entrusted the earl of Manetheth¹ with the duty of reducing it to order. After the king's departure, certain of the Scots, knaves rather than knights, plundered the abbeys of that district so thoroughly, that in their accursed madness, finding a monk who was at the very point of death, lying within the infirmary of Glenlus, they stripped him of even the scrap of sackcloth with which he was covered and carried it off. At Tunghland, they killed the prior and the sacrist within the church; but the Almighty did not suffer their sins to pass unpunished; for not long afterwards that murderer was caught and drawn by horses at Roxburgh.

When the Scots heard that this G[ilroth] had returned from Ireland, bringing with him a fleet and a body of the Irish, together with the son of one of their chieftains, they, in the midst of their hasty flight, arrived at a piece of water, in which many of them perished by means of that accursed army. But when this G[ilroth] returned from Ireland, no sooner did he reach the land, than he directed that every ship should be broken up; using this device, to prevent any one of those whom he had brought with him from returning home again.

As soon as these tidings reached G. bishop of Galloway, A. abbot of Melrose, and P. earl of Dunbar, they did not fail to extend to the son, though degenerating, the friendship in which they had held the father while living. The bishop and abbot proceeded to the district of Galloway unattended, but the earl was accompanied with his troops; and they informed this G[ilroth] that he must either make his submission to the king, or engage the earl's army in battle. Perceiving his inferiority in numbers, G[ilroth] followed their advice, and the king placed him for some time in the custody of the earl already mentioned. Being thus deprived of all counsel and assistance, the bastard was enforced to sue for the king's peace. He was imprisoned for a short time in Edinburgh castle, and then the king gave him his freedom. After this the Irish secretly departed from the country; and as they were passing by the city of Glasgow they were discovered by the citizens, who unanimously sallied forth, and cut off the heads of as many as they could lay hands upon. They saved two of the oldest of the party, whom they afterwards caused to be drawn by horses at Edinburgh. Thus Galloway, having been at last restored to tranquillity, those who had inherited it took possession of their lands, which they divided equally among themselves.

The lady Marjory, the sister of our lord Alexander, the king of the Scots, was married at Berwick, upon the day of St. Peter ad Vincula [1st Aug.], to the earl of Pembroke. There were present at the marriage the king himself and the chief of the nobility of his realm; and on the other side were G., the marshal of England, and the bridegroom, together with a large number of the English nobles.

This year our lord Alexander, king of Scotland,¹ gave the forest of Ettrich to the house of Melrose, and decreed that the abbey of Melrose, and its four circumjacent granges, should be free of his forest.

A. D. 1236. Constantine, abbot of Newbottle, resigned his office, and he was succeeded in it by Roger, the cellarer of Melrose.

This same year died Gilbert, the venerable bishop of Dunkeld, and he was buried in the island of St. Columbanus. Geoffrey, the king's clerk, was elected in his stead.

Jordan, abbot of Dundraynan, and Robert abbot of Glenluce, whom we have just mentioned, were deposed; and Leonius, a monk of Melrose, was chosen to rule Dundraynan on the day before the Ascension [7th May]; and not long afterwards Michael, the prior of Melrose, was appointed abbot of Glenluce. Alan, the first abbot of St. Edward's of Balmurinauh, died on the vigil of the apostles Peter and Paul [28th June]. Ralph, the cellarer of the same house, succeeded him.

The kings of England and Scotland had an interview² at New-castle, where they discussed their affairs.

William, bishop of Worcester, died. On the day of the Nativity of the blessed Mary [9th Sept.], Herbert, abbot of Kelso, laid down his staff and mitre upon the great altar, and in this manner bade adieu to the pastoral care. He was succeeded by Hugh de . . .³, a monk of the same place.

A. D. 1237. Richard, bishop of Durham, of holy memory, died; he was the illustrious founder of the new church of Salisbury, and he went the way of all flesh upon the day after the festival of the saints Tiburtius and Valerius [15th April], being the third day of the week before Easter, on the first hour of the day; and his body was buried in the church of the nuns of Tarent, which he had founded. At this present time the limbs of sick people, whatever be the nature of their disease, are frequently restored to health at his holy tomb.

During this year the two kings, with their queens and the nobility of both realms, had a meeting at York,⁴ upon the day of St. Maurice [22d Sept.], and there they discussed the affairs of their respective kingdoms for fifteen days, in the presence of Otho, the legate of our lord the pope. Upon the breaking up of the conference, the king of Scotland returned home; but the queen of Scotland, together with the queen of England, went onwards to Canterbury, for the sake of praying there. She died in the neighbourhood of London, as will presently appear.

Gilbert, abbot of Holmcoltran, died at Canterbury, on his way home from the general chapter; and he was succeeded by John, the abbot of Jugum Dei: whereupon Nicolas, the prior of Jugum Dei, took upon himself the pastoral care of that house.

A. D. 1238. Master Hugh de Potton, archdeacon of Glasgow, died; and after his decease the archdeaconry was divided; for master Matthew de Habirden assumed the title of archdeacon of Glasgow, and master Peter de Alingtun was styled archdeacon of Thevidale.

William, abbot of Dunfermelin, died, and was succeeded by Geoffrey, the prior of the same house.

The lady Johanna,¹ queen of Scotland, was attacked by a severe illness when in the neighbourhood of London, where she died, on the 4th of the nones of March [4th March], in the arms of her brothers Henry, king of England, and R[ichard], duke of Cornwall, after having received the sacraments of the church. She died childless. Her brothers buried her body, with great grief and with equal magnificence, in the church of the nuns of Tarent.

William Malevicine, bishop of St. Andrew's, died, and David de Bernam was elected to the bishopric. The abbot of Clairvaux died; and John, abbot of Citeaux, resigned his pastoral office, there being no small discord in the order. Peter, bishop of Winchester, died.

In this year there broke out a lamentable war between our lord pope Gregory and the emperor Frederick, surnamed the Youth of Apulia, between whom the holy church is reported to have encountered many a storm in our times.

During this year the intelligence reached our country for the first time, respecting the devastations committed in many lands by the accursed army of the Tartars, respecting the truth of which we shall have more to say presently.

A. D. 1239. Gilbert, bishop of Aberdeen, died, and was succeeded by Ralph de Lamley, abbot of Haberbrothoce. Roger, abbot of Rievaulx, resigned his office, and his successor was Leonius, abbot of Dundraynan and monk of Melrose. Richard, prior of Melrose²

Alexander, the most noble king of Scotland, took to wife the lady Mary, the daughter of the illustrious Ingeran de Cuchi, on the ides of May [15th May], being Whitsunday, at Roxburgh³ and the lord Herbert was compelled by the command of Otho, the legate of our lord the pope, to resume the office which he had so unadvisedly relinquished.

Edward, the eldest son of the king of England, was born on the day before the kalends of June [31st May]. Richard, prior of Melrose, was elected to the government of the house of Dundraynan.

Tulliano, and the legate of the apostolic see—came into Scotland, about the feast of St. Matthew the apostle and evangelist [21st Sept.]; and he being at Melrose upon the eve of St. Dionysius [8th Oct.], the before-mentioned H. was elected, for the second time, abbot of Kelso, in his presence; for his predecessor Herbert (a man worthy of all praise for his life and conversation), being now full of years, had of his own free will resigned the pastoral office. The same Otho held a council at Edinburgh, upon the morrow of St. Luke the evangelist [19th Oct.], and departed from Scotland after the feast of All Saints [1st Nov.].

Henry, abbot of Jeddeworth, being far advanced in years, resigned the pastoral charge on account of his bodily infirmity, being succeeded therein by Philip, a canon of the same house.

This year the bones of the venerable Adam, bishop of Caithness, were removed from the spot in which they had been buried after his martyrdom;¹ and having been conveyed to his episcopal see, they were there honourably interred. It is reported that many miracles were performed at their removal.

A. D. 1240. The venerable Leonius, abbot of Rievaulx, died on the sixth of the ides of January [8th Jan.]; he was succeeded as abbot, after Easter, by Adam de Tilletai.

In the same year, upon St. Brice's day [22d Jan.], David de Bernam was consecrated in his see by William, bishop of Glasgow. Walter, abbot of Driburgh, resigned his office; and John, a canon of the same house, succeeded him. L[lewellyn], king of Wales, died, and was succeeded by his son David.

John de Normanville died; and Alexander, abbot of Cupre, resigned his pastoral care, being succeeded therein by Gilbert, a monk of the same house. Joceline, bishop of Bath, died. The bishop of Norwich also died, and was succeeded by William de Raley. Master Robert de Bigham, bishop of Salisbury, died; also master Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and Boniface succeeded. Alexander, bishop of Chester, also died, and was succeeded by Hugh de Patishil.

Moreover, our lord pope Gregory enjoined that some bishops from out of every realm which professed the Christian faith, should attend at Rome, and appear personally before him on the Easter next ensuing [31st March, 1241]. There were summoned from Scotland, by name, the lord bishop of Glasgow, and David, the lord bishop of St. Andrew's, who, setting out upon their journey, left this our land at Advent [2d Dec.], while many lamented at their departure.

Geoffrey, abbot of Dunfermelin, died; and Robert, a monk of the same house, succeeded him.

In this same year the bones of the abbots of Melrose, which had been deposited at the entrance of the chapter-house, were taken up and buried with greater solemnity in the eastern part of the said building. The bones, however, of our venerable father Walleve were not removed, for when his tomb was opened it was discovered that his body was reduced to dust: those who were present carried off a few of the smaller bones, and the residue remained in peace. One of those who was a witness of this was a knight of good reputation, called William,¹ the son of the earl, the nephew of our lord the king. By his entreaties he secured one of the teeth, by which (as he afterwards stated) many sick persons were cured.

A. D. 1241. It was reported that numerous miracles were wrought at the tomb of Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury. Walter, the son of Alan the younger, died.

After having been for a long time deprived of a pastor, the church of Durham at length received master Nicolas de Farnham as its bishop: he was a man advanced in years, and had been the queen's physician; and thus, from being a physician of the body, he became a physician of souls.

William, earl of Albemarle, died. Also Gilbert, earl marshal of England, died, leaving no issue.

William, lord bishop of Glasgow, and David, lord bishop of St. Andrew's, returned home, in company with the bishops of France and England, having previously lodged an appeal against the legates who had been their guides; for they affirmed that they could not reach the apostolic see without having incurred the danger of being killed. Upon their return home, their legates, along with many others, including several religious persons of high rank, went back by sea. And since it would be tedious were I to introduce all the details, I have thought it better to insert here a copy of the letter which the lord of Cîteaux sent to the abbot of Savigny from the emperor's prison :

"The abbots of Cîteaux,² of Clairvaux,³ and of Pietas Dei [la Piété Dieu],⁴ send greeting to the venerable father of Savigni.⁵

"We have to inform you, that in our anxiety to escape from danger, we have miserably fallen into the hands of the emperor's sailors, who first pillaged us, without mercy, of everything we possessed, and then, after having been exposed to many miseries at sea for a whole week, they triumphantly carried us away, naked and shoeless as we were, to the city of Pisa, along with two hundred galleys of which they had plundered the men of Genoa. At this present time we are suffering a miserable confinement in the castle of St. Minax, which 'is styled the Emperor's Chamber, and this by the imperial commands. Our companions the monks and converts are also in prison at Pisa; they are all safe (thanks be to God's grace!), with the exception of the notary of the lord abbot of Cîteaux, who was drowned in the sea, while we looked on, but were unable to render any assistance. There are with us in the same condemnation, the lord legate, namely, he of Præneste and Gregory (these two are kept in chains), the archbishops of Bordeaux and Mithanensis, the bishops of Cartmog, Agde, Noyon, ³ Id. col. 807.

Tridom, Hyst, and Pavia, and the abbots of Clugni and Foigni,¹ along with many provosts and archpresbyters, and other men of importance from every part of the globe, all of whom are in chains of iron, a fate which we are fully persuaded awaits the whole of us before long, without any respect of persons. Since, then, we can send you no intimation as to our release and return, but rather, on the contrary, since we anticipate a continuance of our abode here, we have to entreat you that, with all the speed you can employ, you would send to their respective homes, under safe-conduct, our retinues, our converts, and all our household establishments, charging them that they shall make our condition fully known to our convents, in order that they become all the more careful for the interests of our order in proportion as they are aware of the danger to which we are at this time exposed. Do you, then, vouchsafe to direct that special prayer be offered for us, that we may endure our present afflictions, and all such future evils as may be in store for us, with patience and meekness. Our confidence truly is, that all this present adversity shall be turned to our future prosperity, and that sweetness shall spring out of the present bitterness. It is for you, therefore, to employ all care and diligence that the integrity of the order be preserved, since the Lord has delivered you, as you perceive, from the extremity of these storms. The lord legate of England and the archbishop of Rouen, who had at first remained at Pisa, are now of late removed to [the custody of] other prelates by the emperor's command. The archbishop of Bisantium is drowned in the sea; the abbot of Fécamp, who was in the same galley with the archbishop of Bisantium, is alive, but a prisoner; all the Spanish bishops escaped. The lord emperor has in his prison only three legates, three archbishops, and six bishops; as for abbots and proctors, we will not speak of them at present."

The Welshmen,² who are the descendants of the Britons, (who, from the time of their first king Brute, have been under the rule of a native prince, under whom and by whom their causes were decided,) are now compelled to go to London, there to have their suits determined by the judgment of the English. Thus it has come about that, according to Merlin's prophecy, "the red dragon" (that is, the Britons) "is sick in the extremity of the lake," (that is, of the island,) "being held in subjection by the white dragon" (meaning the English).

Christiana Corbet, the wife of William, the son of the earl, died, and was buried in the chapter-house of Melrose.

Pope Gregory died, on the eleventh of the kalends of September [22d of Oct.], and about the feast of All Saints [1st Nov.] he was succeeded by Celestine, who, after occupying the see for about fifteen days, died. After his decease, the papal chair remained empty, and the peace of the church was thereby disturbed.

In this same year, the eldest child of our lord Alexander, king of Scotland, was born at Roxburgh, on the day of the translation of St. Cuthbert, the day before the nones of September [Wednesday, 4th Sept.], being the fourth day of the week, and the child was named Alexander. He was born in the commencement of the forty-fourth year of the age of his father; the twenty-seventh year of his reign then drawing towards its conclusion.

John de Macheswel was buried at Melrose. William, bishop of Argyll, was drowned at sea.

A. D. 1242. Master Peter de Alinton, archdeacon of Twidale, died, and was succeeded by master Reginald de Irewin. Master Roger, surnamed Niger, bishop of London, died. Hugh de Patessil died; he was bishop of Chester, or of Coventry, or of Lichesfield.

Henry, king of England, passed the sea to take possession of his continental lands. John Cumin, earl of Angus, died in France.

Patrick, earl of Athol, the son of Thomas of Galloway, who was also the earl of Athol, a most excellent youth, and (as far as man can judge) adorned with all courtly wisdom and politeness, was wickedly murdered,—alas! that we should have to tell it—along with two of his companions, in his own residence, at Haddington, after he had gone to rest for the night; and this was done by some wicked wretches. To conceal the extent of the crime, the house in which they were lying was burnt down, that it might appear that they had perished accidentally in the conflagration, and not by murder. But He who bringeth to light the hidden things of darkness, revealed publicly what these evil persons had done in private, as will appear in the following narrative. After his death, David de Hastings took his earldom, which devolved to him in right of his wife, who was the aunt by the mother's side of the murdered youth.

William de Somerville was buried at Melrose. The lord Walter Olifard, justiciary of Lothian, died, and was honourably buried in the chapter-house of Melrose. Andrew, bishop of Moray, died. Thunder was audible on the sixteenth of the kalends of January [16th Dec.].

A. D. 1243. John Biseth, and his uncle Walter, and others their accomplices were outlawed, because (as fame reported) this John had murdered Patric de Athol at the instigation of the William already mentioned.

Master A. de Baggate was buried at Melrose. The lord Gillebert de Humframville took the countess of Angus to wife.

All the prelates who had been confined in the emperor's prison were permitted to depart in freedom; they then came to Rome and presented themselves to the cardinals. They, delighted at the spectacle, went to Anagnia; and there upon the morrow of St. John the baptist [25th June], they elected as pope a presbyter cardinal named Synebald, by the title of St. Martin in Montibus; and having consecrated him upon the octaves of St. Peter and St. Paul [28th June], they styled him Innocent the fourth.

William, abbot of Clairvaux, went the way of all flesh, whilst he was on his return from the [papal] court, in company with William, abbot of Citeaux; for the abbot of Pietas Dei laid aside his pastoral charge, and having been detained by the pope, was by him made a cardinal.

Lord Roger Avenel was buried at Melrose, near his father. Michael, abbot of Glenluce, was buried at Walcheles, upon the day of St. Michael [29th Sept.]; as also Gilbert, lord abbot of Cupre, who was interred at St. Remigius, on the sixth of the ides of October [12th Oct.], both of them being on their way home from the general chapter.

During the Advent of our Lord, William de Binin, prior of Newbotle, was appointed to the rule of the house of Cupre.

A. D. 1244. William, abbot of Citeaux, refused to exercise the office of abbot, and was succeeded by . . . ,¹ the abbot of Férte. Also, Alan Musard of Rievalx, was appointed abbot of Glenluce.

In this same year, pope Innocent came into the land of the king of France, and remained for some time at Lyons; and there, upon the day of the Holy Trinity [29th May], he consecrated, as bishop of Porto, Otho, who had formerly been legate in England and Scotland. He had before this appointed as cardinal presbyter, by the title of St. Laurence in Lucio, John, formerly abbot of Pietas Dei.

During this year, the accursed traitor Walter Biset and his accomplices ceased not to pour into the ears of Henry, king of England, the poison of discord, until he summoned his army and marched as far as Newcastle, against our lord Alexander, the king of Scotland. The king of Scotland met him at Ponteland with a large army; but a treaty of peace was concluded between them, on the vigil of the Assumption [24th Aug.], chiefly at the instance of the archbishop of York and of the other nobles. In consequence of this arrangement the king of Scotland returned home, and the king of England determined to make an inroad upon Wales; for the Welsh had rebelled, being unable to endure the yoke of the English. We must not omit to state that He who is the King of Glory, determined to elevate the king of Scotland by the gift of miracles, as we have heard from many.

This year the land of Jerusalem was destroyed, and these letters reached our lord the pope.

“ To our most holy father and lord Innocent, by the grace of God, the pontiff of the holy see of Rome, Robert, by the same grace, patriarch of the holy church of Jerusalem, the legate of the apostolic see, archbishop of Regina in Cyprus and of Bavilla in the kingdom of Jerusalem, the archbishop of Tyre, R., bishop of Acres, G., bishop of Sidon, R., bishop of Lidda, to Herman of Perigord, the master of the knights of the Temple, brother William, master of the house of the Hospital of St. John, and the preceptor of the house of St. Mary of the Teutonic knights, Odo de Mont Beliard, the lord of Tiberias, and the constable of the king of Jerusalem, Philip de Montfort, lord of Teron, desire to kiss your blessed feet, offering their eternal subjection.

“ We are persuaded that your holiness has not lost sight of the account which we forwarded to you through our patriarch, concerning the miserable condition of the Holy Land, and the afflictions which have befallen it of late from the sudden and unexpected arrival of the Corosmins. But since there exists at this present time a more than usual necessity for making you acquainted with the scourge which, for our faults, the Lord hath been pleased to bring upon the Holy Land, we are constrained with one consent to inform you (since you are placed in the watch-tower of the Lord, above the other watchmen, and because you have the daily care of all the churches)—we repeat that we are constrained to inform you of the groans of the church of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the Christian people, and the danger of the Holy Land. We cannot, therefore, conceal from your holiness that these Corosmins, whose cruelty exceeds the fierceness of wild beasts, at the very commencement of their arrival took possession of the greater part of the province of Jerusalem, namely, from ‘Nirone militum,’ (which is eight miles distant from Jerusalem,) as far as the parts of Ascalon and Gaza, and still keep it in their possession. An unforeseen fear and trembling laid hold upon the hearts of the Christian population upon their arrival; for they were aware that these people were in the habit of inflicting upon them every species of cruelty, and thirsted for their blood. They were expelled from their own native soil by the power of the Tartars; and having no other place of residence, they advanced upon this which we have mentioned, at the command of the soldan of Babylon, who is reported to have given them the districts which are inhabited by the Christians. Nor is it their intention simply to devastate the land and then depart, but they have come to take possession of it and inhabit it as their own, with their wives and families, intending to claim its dwellings and habitations as their property; unless the power of the Almighty resist them, and the apostolic see extend its protecting hand against them. For the soldan, whom we have mentioned, the head of this sacrilegious body, protects and defends them, and supports them by ample pay and costly gifts; for he believes that by them he will subjugate the king of Damascus and the Christian people; yet this soldan does not venture out of Babylon, nor are they permitted to enter within the land of Babylon; for he holds them in suspicion in consequence of their power and faithlessness.

“Now, although this calamity occasioned by the Corosmins is in itself sufficient to distress, more than enough, the minds of all men, another grief has originated by the arrival of the Tartars, a countless army of whom has terrified and smitten the whole of the east. Passing over the ‘Aquæ Frigidæ,’ they have penetrated as far as the ‘Pons Ferreus,’ near Antioch, devastating everything, like a countless swarm of locusts. God’s goodness provided, however, that the soldans of Damascus and Aleppo and Camella entered into a treaty with them for a given time, (at a considerable outlay, indeed,) and so they have returned to the distant regions whence they came. The anxiety which we and the whole Christian population experienced, on the approach of this people, has subsided upon their departure. Our whole care is how we shall escape the sword of the Corosmins which is hanging over us; so we labour without ceasing to procure their expulsion, and shall continue so to do; and although we have earnestly exhorted the illustrious king of Cyprus and the prince of Antioch to render assistance to the Holy Land, yet from the former we have had no aid whatever, and the latter, apprehensive of the return of the Tartars, has been prodigal in his excuses.

“There are in the Holy Land a very limited number of foreign knights and foot-soldiers, the whole collective amount of whom would scarce reach a hundred. The knights who belong to the district are scattered far and wide, occupied in the garrisoning of the castles, so that they cannot be readily called together, since they may not leave the fortresses unprotected; and it has been decided by the general opinion of the whole land, that it would not be advisable to attack these wretches, or even to engage with them. It would be very hazardous for so few men to meet such a large and powerful body, especially as they have been reinforced, since their first arrival, by an accession of troops from the same nation: so large that report represents them equal in number to the first body of invaders. It is confidently stated that there are no less than twelve thousand lightly equipped men-at-arms, exclusive of others of less account, their wives and families.

“It was agreed, therefore, by common consent, to invoke the assistance of the soldans of Damascus and Camella, who are associated with the Christians by truce and treaty, and have a deadly feud with the Corosmins. After many solicitations these soldans promised that they would come to help the Christians with all their strength; but their arrival has been unexpectedly delayed from day to day, to the disappointment of every one, for without their co-operation it would be dangerous for the Christians to hazard a battle.

“In the meantime the inhabitants of Jerusalem, being hemmed in on every side by their enemies, and afflicted within by hunger, without by the sword, were oppressed with many terrors and dangers; and we were in the hope from day to day of rendering them assistance by collecting an army. But the faithless Corosmins invaded Jerusalem with a great multitude, and entered that city upon Monday, the eleventh of July. The Christian inhabitants thereupon took refuge in the hospitals and in the churches of Jerusalem, which were close at hand; and defending themselves within the wooden fortresses and the stone turrets, they gained the victory that day (by the mercy of Jesus Christ) over these wicked ones, and slew many of them. But, finding themselves unable to carry out their intentions, they withdrew in confusion, and unexpectedly stormed the church of St. James, belonging to the Armenians, who resided within the same city and took it, and slew with the edge of the sword many Armenians whom they found within that church—priests, clergy, and laity; and they beheaded the imperial governor of the castle and the preceptor of the hospital of St. John, who had bravely gone out against them to battle. Having been repulsed from the city upon this occasion, they withdrew to some buildings which they had erected in the outskirts. Urged by the extremity of this their necessity, the inhabitants of Jerusalem most earnestly required assistance from us, and very frequently sent letters and messages to us and other Christians to that effect; but we could by no means furnish them with the aid which they required; for the whole district was surrounded by the enemy, nor was there any means of obtaining access to the city save by passing through the army of the Corosmins. So we were partakers in their affliction, and our hearts were embittered by their sorrows. Earnestly intent upon rendering them assistance, we agreed, by common consent, that a message should be sent to the soldan of the Vallies, (who lately had entered into a truce with some of the Christians,) requesting that by his help the people already mentioned might have a secure and safe passage to the land of the Christians. Along with our letters we sent to the said soldan influential messengers, whom we enjoined, that after they had heard his answer they should obtain his safe-conduct for the admission into Jerusalem of friar Simon, of the order of the Preachers, to strengthen the hearts of the Christian population, and that, while he was stating to them the answer of the soldan, he should carefully note the condition of the land and the people, and should inform us on all these particulars.

“ Thus, then, the messengers whom we have mentioned went to the soldan, and urgently entreated him for the safe-conduct, and received from him for answer that he would most willingly give them the means of admission into Jerusalem, but that he could not do this without the consent of the Corosmins. He promised faithfully, however, that he would send a formal embassy to the Corosmins, whom (he said) he would induce by entreaties and presents to suffer the Christian population to come in safety, he himself giving security for the conduct of the soldan. This same friar Simon, leaving behind him all the other messengers, accompanied the soldan (under his safe-conduct) into Jerusalem, as we had commanded. He assembled the whole population, and having preached to them the word of God, he comforted them exceedingly, and exhorted them, and gave them absolution, as the patriarch had been enjoined by us; and he communicated to them the answer which he had received from the soldan by other messengers. After a council of deliberation had been held, the people of Jerusalem answered, that they would rather die within the city by famine and pestilence than trust themselves to those most cruel heathen, or deliver themselves into the hands of the soldan, of whose want of faith they were certain and could have no manner of doubt; but that their firm resolution was to remain within the city, and there to await the mercy of Jesus Christ and succour. In investigating the condition of the country, friar Simon discovered that they had food sufficient to last them for six weeks.

“ Having heard their answer, he strictly prohibited any one from privately leaving the city without a general safe-conduct; he bade them hope in the mercy of the Highest, and defend themselves like men, and await the arrival of the Christian army. He then left the city, and, visiting the soldan on his way back, obtained his safe-conduct, and came to us with the intelligence which we have stated.

“ On the third day after his return, and at the ninth hour, we were assured that a large body of the men-at-arms had left the city during the night, without having consulted the rest, or informed them of their intention, and unfortunately had reached Joppa. While we were lamenting about the stealthy departure of these people, and were no little disturbed therewith, thinking upon the division and loss which it would occasion to the remainder of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, we shortly afterwards heard evil and lamentable tidings respecting them. For they (being apprehensive of a return of the Corosmins), leaving behind them such of their number as would not abandon the city, upon Tuesday, being the eve of St. Bartholomew [23d Aug.], about the hour of vespers, by common consent, went out of the city, clerks and monks, and the laity of both sexes, resolving to advance through the mountainous districts until they reached the land of the Christians. They depended upon the truce into which they had entered with these Saracens in the mountains; and they hoped, by adopting this route, to escape all danger from the Corosmins. But while they thought they were escaping from Scylla, they miserably fell into Charybdis. For these faithless Saracens came down from the hills upon them with an unexpected assault, and attacked them the whole night long: they killed (as it is reported) more than two thousand of them, pouring out their guiltless blood round about Jerusalem, and there was no man to bury them. The boys and the girls they carried off captives—they did not spare the aged; such of the aforesaid people as they did not choose to kill, they brought into a miserable slavery, selling them to the other Saracens. Moreover, the few of that people who escaped from the hands of these Saracens, and reached the plain of Ramessa, were there overtaken by death and the sword from another quarter. For the Corosmins assailed them as enemies, and slew them cruelly; and so great was the loss between the killed and the captured, that of the whole number scarce three hundred reached Joppa in disorder, and these were wounded and half-dead.

“ Since, therefore, their innocent blood crieth to the Lord from the ground, may it be presented also before your blessed presence, so as to excite in you compassion and pity. Thus the prophecy of Jeremiah is fulfilled upon Jerusalem: ‘ Servants have ruled over us, . . . the joy of our heart is ceased; our dance is turned into mourning.’ (Lam. v. 8, 15.)

“ We grieve to relate still further, that, after having committed this slaughter, the perfidious Corosmins entered the city of Jerusalem, no one offering any resistance; for now she stood deserted, having been abandoned by the larger part of her population. They broke into the church of the sepulchre of the Lord—the spot in which our Lord Jesus Christ poured forth his precious blood, when hanging upon the cross, for the salvation of mankind,—and they miserably slaughtered with the edge of the sword the Christians who had taken refuge therein, that they might there endure martyrdom for Christ, thus staining the whole pavement with the blood of the martyrs. It is unnecessary to proceed. The priests who were celebrating at the altars of the church were beheaded by these infidels, even while performing the holy mysteries, and thus offered themselves up as a sacrifice to God the Father. Oh happy spirit of master Peter de Montronda, canon of Reims and Sens, who followed the Lord, carrying his cross; for as they were celebrating in the church of the Holy Sepulchre, he offered himself a sacrifice to Jesus Christ, having been slain by the unbelievers on the very spot where the Son of God had offered himself as a victim to God!

“The boundless filthiness and cruelty of this infidel race surpass the wickedness of all others of the Saracens; for the latter, during the times they have held possession of Jerusalem, showed some respect to the lives of the Greeks, Armenians, and Jacobites, and other inhabitants who were Christians, even although they kept them in a state of slavery; for they permitted them in peace to celebrate the divine mysteries within, and to have the custody of the church of the Sepulchre, and the other holy places. But the most perfidious Corosmins spared neither religious person, sex, nor age; and to the best of their ability they profaned the holy places, nor did they leave a single Christian within the city. They stripped the covering of lead from off the roof of the church of the Sepulchre; nay more, stretching out their sacrilegious hands upon the marble entablature which everywhere surrounds the Lord's Sepulchre, they threw it entirely down; and the very place in which our Lord was buried they abundantly defiled, as far as they were able. No one can remember that the Saracens ever perpetrated such abominations as these have done.

“Going up to the church of Bethlehem, it is said that they violated it in many ways; for they shamefully abused the holiest places, that is to say, Mount Sion, the Temple of the Lord, and the other venerated places within the city of Jerusalem. And so murderers now dwell within the beautiful city, which was the joy of the whole earth, in which justice once abode; for the crimes of the Christians demanded this. And the offering and the sacrifice have ceased; for they have taken away the daily sacrifice,¹ and the place of the sanctuary they have cast down; they have polluted the place of the tabernacle of his Name, in despite and contempt of the name of Christ.

“We have further to acquaint you, O holy father, that to such a height of audacity and pride have they risen, that they have extended themselves over the whole country, and everywhere perpetrate excesses. They did not stop short at Tiberias and the neighbourhood, but carried sword and fire as far as Acre, thus ravaging a district of seven miles. The parts beyond the sea are in greater danger and necessity than they are remembered to have been for the last hundred years.

“Therefore let the pitiful groans of the Holy Land enter into the ears of the vicar of Christ; hear the lamentations of the church of Jerusalem, and the revilings of those who revile the Christian religion. Let there go out from the Church of Rome a sharp two-edged sword to avenge the innocent blood; let consolation for the desolate be dispensed out of her treasures. Let the word of exhortation proceed out of her lips, calling upon all the kings and princes of the world to avenge the injury offered to Jesus Christ, by whom they live and reign; and let such speedy succour as your holiness shall think fit to appoint be rendered to this land, in order to wipe out the insults inflicted upon the people.

“Dated at Acre, upon the day of St. Matthew [21st Sept.], A. D. 1244.”

“Th. the humble arch. . . . of Ciren. . . .¹ to John and Andrew, the religious men in Christ who are beyond the sea.

“We refer you to the prior of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem for some rumours from beyond the sea, which we must describe as being lamentable, miserable, terrible, horrible, and damnable. He is the bearer of letters to the most Christian king of France, written, not with ink, but with blood (so it is said, for I have not seen them), but they who have seen them declare that the letters are red. The outline is this: that the master of the Hospital of St. Mary of the Teutonic knights and all his convent (saving a few who escaped), and the whole knighthood which is beyond the sea, a large share of the armed Christian population, and along with them Narcissus, soldan of Turkey, and another soldan, who was captured by the Corosmins and the men of the soldan of Babylon, were all killed upon the seventeenth of October. It is reported, moreover, that earl William and lord Philip were captured. The lord patriarch and the constable escaped. Here is cause for grief and lamentation.”

A. D. 1245. Hugh, abbot of St. Servanus, died, a man of a thoroughly commendable life, and one zealous for the holy religion. He was succeeded in the pastoral government by a monk of the same house, by name Matthew, upon the fifth of the ides of March [11th March]. In the Advent² of the same year pope Innocent the fourth came into the land of the king of France. In this same year Louis, the illustrious and most Christian king of the French, the beloved of God, was seized with a grievous illness (the providence of God, who rules and disposes everything, so decreeing it) within the city of Paris. The sickness increasing in severity, and life appearing to be nearly extinct, it appeared to the bystanders that he had paid the penalty of death. When he had laid upon the bed of sorrow, and no sign of vitality had appeared in him for full three days, to the astonishment of all who were present, he suddenly raised his eyes to heaven, and with a loud voice he blessed the name of the Almighty God. Having summoned the bishop of Paris, he directed that the sign of the cross should be fixed by him upon his shoulder, since it was his intention to set out upon an expedition for the purpose of magnifying the Name of Jesus Christ, and extending the glory of the cross, wheresoever the holy church might be pleased to direct. The bishop, with due devotion, executed the holy wishes of the good king, who immediately recovered from his sickness.

At the same time that most wicked emperor, Frederick, when he heard of the sickness of the king, and that he had assumed the cross, sent him these letters, with a fraudulent intention, as it is believed:—

“ Frederick, by the grace of God, the emperor of the Romans, and perpetual Augustus, the king of Jerusalem and Sicily, to Louis, by the grace of God the illustrious king of the French, sends greeting, and the affection of a sincere love.

“ There has reached our ears a report which has occasioned us much sorrow, a report which tells us that your majesty has fallen into a grievous sickness through the weakness of the flesh. This sorrow, however, was turned into rejoicing, and our pain into pleasure, when the intelligence of your restoration to health arrived, telling us that the right hand of God’s power, who pitieth and maketh whole, had delivered you from the very gates of death. It proceeds from the same influence, and springs from the same depth of the counsels of the Lord, (the necessity of the times so requiring it,) that a new champion has been raised up by God to meet the growing insolence of the heathen, and to check the slaughter inflicted from time to time upon our religion—one who shall do his best to revenge the enormous injury perpetrated upon it, when he shall have assumed the banner of the cross of our God, to which we chiefly look as the strength of our faith. Your sickness, therefore, cannot but be regarded as a blessing, when we consider its results, though in itself it was a calamity; and thus the sorrow which it occasioned has been turned into an abundant cause for rejoicing. The general import of my meaning is this, that by the happy expedition which your majesty is about to undertake to the land of our Lord, our honour shall receive an increase, and the disgrace inflicted upon our faith shall be wiped out, when that region is delivered by the power of France from the swords of our Saracen enemies.”¹

“ Innocent the bishop, the servant of the servants of God, in the presence of this sacred council, and as a continued memorial of the event.

“ Since we, all unworthy as we are, have been raised to the summit of the apostolic dignity by God’s wisdom, it is our duty to give careful heed to the welfare of all Christians, and with the eye of a deep scrutiny to distinguish the deserts of each person, and to weigh them in the balance of a careful deliberation. Thus we may exalt to due honour such as the stringency of a close examination pronounces to be worthy of the favour; and if any be guilty, that we may punish them according to their deserts; weighing always punishment and reward in a just scale, and awarding to each several individual the censure or the favour proportionate to the quality of his work.

“ Now, since hostile disturbances have long afflicted some provinces which have embraced Christianity, we, in our hearty desire for the tranquillity and peace of the holy church of God to all Christian people collectively, have thought it advisable to despatch special messengers, men of great authority, to that secular prince who is the chief originator of this discord and tribulation, and who, in consequence of his excesses, had been placed under the bond of excommunication by our predecessor of holy memory, pope Gregory; we have sent (we repeat) upon this mission P[eter] of Albano, then archbishop of Rouen, William, then bishop of Sabina, but formerly bishop of Modena, and our beloved son W., priest-cardinal of the church of the Twelve Apostles, and at that time abbot of St. Fecundus, all of whom were jealous for his welfare. We caused it to be intimated to him by them, that we and our brethren, as far as in us lay, were desirous of being at peace with him on every point, as indeed we wished to be with all men, and that we were prepared to extend that same peace and quiet to him and to the whole world. And since it would considerably tend to the accomplishment of this unity if he would restore to liberty those prelates, clerks, and all others whom he was keeping in prison, and also all the clerks and laymen whom he had captured in the galleys, we caused the same messengers to make a request and petition to him for their liberation, the more especially as he himself, and his messengers for him, had promised to our said predecessor that he would do this thing before we were called to the apostolic see. Moreover, we stated that the same messengers were prepared, on our part, to hear his terms, and to treat of peace, and also to listen to any offer of satisfaction which he, the chief person of all those for whose behalf he had incurred the sentence of excommunication, might be inclined to propose. Besides all this, they were instructed to suggest, that if the church had undeservedly injured him in any particular, (which, however, she did not believe to be the case,) she was prepared to make atonement, and to place the matter upon its true and proper footing. And should he affirm that the church, or we ourselves in particular, had injured him in any point, then we were ready to summon to meet at any secure place, kings, prelates, and princes, as well ecclesiastics as seculars, either to attend personally, or by other their special messengers; and that the church was prepared to do him justice according to the decision of the assembly, to make satisfaction as to any point upon which he might have experienced damage, and to revoke whatever sentence had been wrongfully pronounced against him; and with all gentleness and mercy (as far as was consistent with the honour due to God and himself), to receive from him satisfaction for such injuries and offences as he had inflicted upon the church and his own people; and that it was the desire of the church that all his friends and adherents should have such full peace and security, as that they might never hereafter incur any danger on this account.

“ But although we took care thus gently to deal with him respecting peace, by our paternal admonitions and entreaties, he still imitated the hardness of heart of Pharaoh ; and stopping his ears like a deaf adder, he despised these our prayers and entreaties in his mingled obstinacy and pride. And although afterwards, that is to say, upon the Holy Thursday last past, he made a solemn oath, (before us and our brethren, in the presence of our most beloved son in Christ, the illustrious emperor of Constantinople, and a large assemblage of prelates, and the senators and people of Rome, and a great multitude of others, who had congregated from various parts of the world, at the apostolic see upon that day, in consequence of the solemnity which attaches to it,) by the noble count of Toulouse and masters Peter de Vinea and Thaddeus de Suessa, the judges of his court, who were his messengers and proctors, and had a special order to this effect, that he would abide by our commands and those of the church, yet afterwards he did not fulfil what he had sworn to. Nay, rather, the probability is (as his subsequent actions seem to warrant us in believing), that he made that oath rather for the purpose of deceiving us and the church than of obeying ; for although a year and more have now elapsed, he would neither suffer himself to be recalled to the bosom of the church, nor has he taken care to make satisfaction to her for the wrongs and injuries which he had inflicted, although he has been reminded of his duty. Since, then, we are unable any longer to tolerate his iniquities without doing grievous offence to Christ, our conscience constrains us to mark him with our disapprobation.

“ Passing over, for the present, his other crimes, he has committed four most grievous sins, which no cunning can hide. He is deeply perjured. He has rashly violated the peace formerly established between the church and the empire. He has also committed sacrilege in procuring the capture of the cardinals of the holy Roman church, and of the prelates of other churches, and of such clerks and seculars as were on their way to the council which had been summoned in his wisdom by our predecessor. Furthermore, he is suspected of heresy, and that by no doubtful and light arguments, but by weighty and evident proofs.

That he has committed many perjuries is sufficiently evident. For while he was resident in Sicily some time ago, before he had been elected to the imperial dignity, he made oath of fealty to our predecessor of happy memory, pope Innocent, and to his successors, and to the church of Rome, in consequence of the grant of the kingdom of Sicily made to him by the said church ; and this he did in the presence of G. of good memory, the cardinal-deacon of St. Theodore, the legate of the apostolic see. It is further stated that when he was elected to that same dignity, he came to the city [of Rome] and renewed that same oath, in the presence of the said Innocent and his brethren [the cardinals] and many others, doing to him his legal homage. Besides, while he was in Germany, he swore in the presence of the princes and nobles of the empire, that he would, to the best of his power, keep and protect, in good faith, the honours, rights, and possessions of the church of Rome, for the said I[nnocent], and on his death for pope Honorius of good memory, and his successors, and also for that same Roman church; and that he would take care to restore without difficulty what things soever should come into his hands, specifying in the oath the said possessions; and this he afterwards confirmed when he had obtained the imperial crown. These three several oaths, however, he has rashly broken, not without having incurred the brand of treachery and treason. For he has ventured to send threatening letters to the cardinals against our said predecessor G[regory], and against themselves; and, as appears by the same letters then sent by him, by many ways to slander the said G[regory] to the cardinals, as is also reported throughout the whole world. He has caused to be arrested our venerable brother O[tho], bishop of Porto, then cardinal-deacon of St. Nicolas “in Carcere Tulliano,” and the bishop of Preneste, of good memory, both of whom were legates of the apostolic see, and important members of the church of Rome; and after having despoiled them of all their goods, he committed them to prison, having previously dragged them about, in ignominy, from place to place. He has also done his best to contract, or even entirely to abolish from the church, the privilege with which our Lord Jesus Christ Himself invested the blessed Peter and his successors, when He said to him, ‘Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven’ [Matt. xvi. 19.], on which depend the power and authority of the church of Rome; for he wrote that he did not fear the sentences of the said G[regory], and that not only would he despise the excommunication pronounced against him, (disregarding herein the keys of the church,) but farther, that he, by his officials, would not permit others to give any weight to this, or any other sentence of excommunication or interdict. He has not scrupled to lay hands upon the possessions of the church of Rome, namely, the march land, the duchy of Benevento, (the towers and walls of which city he has caused to be destroyed,) and other property which she held elsewhere in Tuscany and Lombardy, with a few exceptions; and these he still holds in possession.

“And as if it were not sufficient for him thus openly to violate his oaths, he and his officials have compelled others, the inhabitants of these districts, to commit perjury, absolving them de facto (since de jure that is impossible) from the oaths of fealty by which they are bound to the church of Rome, and making them abjure that fealty which they had formerly given, and transfer the same to himself. It is notorious that he is a violator of the peace; for formerly during the time of peace between the church and himself, he made oath before J. de Abbeville, bishop of Sabina, and master Thomasius, presbyter-cardinal, by the title of St. Sabina, in the presence of many prelates princes, and barons, that he would stand by and submit to all the commands of the church, simply and without gainsaying, in every matter respecting which he had incurred the penalty of excommunication, the causes of which excommunication were severally specified in his presence; and although he also at the same time made oath, upon his own soul, through N. count of Acerra, that he would withdraw all displeasure and penalty from all the people of Germany, from those of the kingdom of Sicily, and from all others who had taken part with the church against himself, and that he would at no time attack them, or cause them to be attacked; yet afterwards he did not feel ashamed to break this promise of peace and these oaths which he had thus made. For he caused some of those very persons, as well noblemen as others, to be afterwards apprehended; and having plundered them of their goods, he led captive their wives and children. He irreverently invaded the lands of the church, contrary to the promise by him to the said J., bishop of Sabina, and cardinal Thomasius, although they had already pronounced sentence of excommunication against him in his presence, if he should transgress in this respect: and when these same individuals had enjoined him by the apostolic authority that no impediment should arise, either from himself or others, in the freedom of postulation, election, and confirmation for the churches and monasteries in the kingdom aforesaid, according to the decrees of the general council, and that henceforth no ecclesiastic within the kingdom should be treated as a layman, and that due satisfaction should be made to the Templars, Hospitallers, and other ecclesiastical persons, for the injuries and losses inflicted upon them, this command he despised and neglected to fulfil. It is notorious, also, that there are vacant in the said kingdom more than eleven archiepiscopal sees, many bishoprics, and many abbeys and other churches; and that by his means, as is plainly apparent, his subjects have been deprived of the rule of their prelates, to their great prejudice, and to the peril of souls. And although it may happen that some elections are made by chapters in some of the churches in that kingdom, yet since by them clerks from among their own body have been elected, it may hence be fairly concluded that they have enjoyed no free power of election. Not only has he caused the possessions and goods of the churches of his kingdom to be seized at his pleasure, but further, like a despiser of God's service, he has carried off the crosses, chalices, censers, and other treasures and silken cloths; although (as it is stated) he has made a partial restitution upon the payment of a fixed price.

“The clerks, too, are afflicted in many ways by collections and taxes. Not only are they dragged before the secular tribunal, but, as is reported, they are compelled to fight duels; they are imprisoned, are executed, and are hanged, to the dismay and contempt of the clerical order. No satisfaction has been made to these Templars, Hospitallers, and other ecclesiastical persons, for the losses and injuries which have been thus inflicted.

“It is certain, also, that he is a perpetrator of sacrilege. For when the said bishops of Portua and Preneste, and the bishops and clerks of many churches, as well religious men as seculars, were on their way by sea—for he had directed that all access by land should be hindered—to celebrate a council at Rome (which he himself had previously requested might be convoked), he sent his son Enzo thither with a large fleet of galleys. He lay in wait for them with these vessels, and several others which he had collected on the coasts of Tuscany. He was so sacrilegiously bold, that he caused them to be seized, in order that thus he might spit out all the more furiously the venom of his heart; during which seizure some of the prelates and others were drowned, others killed, and others put to flight, as if they were enemies who ought to be persecuted; while the remainder were plundered of all their property, ignominiously dragged about from place to place within the kingdom of Sicily, and then committed to a cruel imprisonment, during which they miserably perished, worn out by filth and hunger.

“ Moreover, there is just cause to accuse him of heretical pravity. For after he had incurred the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against him by the said J., bishop of Sabina, and cardinal Thomas and the said pope Gregory had subjected him to an anathema, and after the capture of the cardinals, prelates and clerks, and others also, at various times, when on their way to the apostolic see,—he despised, and still despises, the keys of the church, causing divine service to be performed, or rather (as far as he is concerned) profaned; and stubbornly affirming, as we have before mentioned, that he does not dread the sentences of the said Gregory. Moreover, he is associated in an accursed friendship with the Saracens, and has often despatched messengers and gifts to them, and received the same from them in return with honour and distinction; he embraces their religious rites, keeps them in daily attendance upon himself, and, following their custom, he is not ashamed to appoint as guards over his wives (who are the descendants of a kingly family) especially such of them as he is said to have emasculated of late. And something yet more accursed; when he was in the parts beyond the sea, some time ago, he permitted the name of Mahomet to be publicly proclaimed night and day in the temple of the Lord, in consequence of an agreement, or rather a fraud, which he had entered into with the soldan; and now of late, he has caused the ambassadors of the soldan of Babylon to be honourably received (as is reported), and sumptuously entertained throughout the kingdom of Sicily, sounding the praises of the soldan; and this after this same soldan, personally and by others, had caused most grievous and incalculable injuries to be inflicted upon the Holy Land, and the Christians therein resident.

“ Turning to an evil account against the faithful the dangerous and mischievous assistance of other misbelievers, and causing himself to become the companion and the friend of such as, despising the apostolic see to their own condemnation, have departed from the unity of the church, he, casting aside the Christian religion, as is affirmed for a certainty, caused the duke of Bavaria, of illustrious memory, the special friend of the church of Rome, to be slain by the Assassins, and gave his daughter in marriage to Bacharius, an enemy to God and the church, who had been solemnly severed, by the sentence of excommunication, from the communion of the faithful, along with all who rendered him aid, counsel, and protection. Rejecting the habits and usages of Catholic princes, and being a despiser of holiness and good reputation, he gives no heed to works of piety; on the contrary (to be silent about his notorious profligacies), although he has learnt to play the oppressor, he takes no care mercifully to relieve the oppressed; nor does he extend his hand in almsgiving, as becomes a prince, although he has been active in the destruction of churches, and has worn out, by long-continued persecution, religious persons and other ecclesiastics; nor has he given any evidence that he has erected churches, or monasteries, or hospitals, or any other pious foundations. These are no trifling grounds for suspecting him of heresy—nay, they are cogent arguments, since the civil law pronounces that those persons are to be included under the definition of heretics (and as such ought to incur its penalties), who are discovered in having departed in the slightest point from the judgment and rule of the Catholic religion.

“ Besides this, he has reduced the kingdom of Sicily, which he the said prince holds in fee from the apostolic see, to such a degree of exhaustion and bondage, as well in its clergy as its laity (although it is the special patrimony of the blessed Peter), that he has expelled them from thence, reduced nearly to a state of complete beggary, and loaded with insults; and such as remain there are constrained by him to live in the condition of slaves, and in many ways to assail and attack in hostile manner the church of Rome, of which they are for the most part the subjects and the vassals. This also is a fitting subject for blame, that for nine years and more he has neglected to pay an annual pension of one thousand sequins, in which sum he is bound to the said church of Rome for that same kingdom.

“ We, therefore, having taken due deliberation beforehand with our brethren [the cardinals] and the holy council, respecting the premises and very many of his other wicked excesses, since, all unworthy as we are, we represent upon earth the jurisdiction of Jesus Christ, and it has been said to us, in the person of the blessed Peter, ‘ Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven ’ [Matt. xvi. 19], we, from the Lord, do hereby declare, denounce, and by sentence depose, the said prince, who has shown himself so unworthy of his empire, his kingdom, and all his honours, and who is rejected of God, and tied and bound in the chain of his sins, on account of his iniquities, so that he shall be neither emperor nor king. We entirely absolve the citizens from the oath of fidelity, as also all those persons who are bound to him by such oath; and by our apostolic authority we firmly enjoin, that henceforth no one shall obey him, or regard him as emperor or king; and we decree, that any persons who shall henceforth give him counsel, assistance, or favour, shall, ipso facto, incur the penalty of excommunication; and that those persons in the empire to whom belongs the privilege of electing an emperor, may lawfully choose a successor. And as for the kingdom of Sicily, we, with the counsel of our brother cardinals, will take care to make provision for it as we shall see fitting.

“Dated at Lyons, on the sixteenth of the kalends of August [17th July], in the third year of our pontificate.”

“Frederick, by the grace of God, the emperor of the Romans, and perpetual Augustus, the king of Jerusalem and Sicily, wishes health and every good thing to the prelates of the churches, barons, nobles, and all persons throughout the realm of England, to whom the present letters may be shown.

“Although we are persuaded that the justice of our cause has been already made known to you, as well by common report as by the truthful testimony of the royal messengers, yet since information communicated through the ears makes a less powerful impression on the mind than that which reaches it through the evidence of the eyes, we present to your inspection a clear, and true, and open account of the proceedings which the popes have hitherto instituted against us. We hope that your affection will not grudge us the time which may be necessary for this purpose, considering that we have given up so many days to your interests. If, then, you will be pleased diligently to give heed to the matters which affect the interests of kings, you will do well to inquire how far there is in our ecclesiastical superiors any zeal for justice, and whether it is right that, when they weary us with so many and so great injuries, we ought to be denied (as we still are denied) the opportunity of offering a defence thereto; and further, ask whether the vicars of Christ are his representatives, and whether the successors of St. Peter are following the example of their predecessor; and lastly, inquire by what law the process thus instituted against us can be considered valid, or by what name it ought to be designated. Can an incompetent judge pronounce a competent sentence? Now, although we, as is fitting, most openly confess that we hold (along with the Catholic faith) that the full plenitude of power in spiritual matters was granted by the Lord to the bishop of the holy see of Rome, even although he be a sinner (which God forbid), so that whatsoever he shall bind in earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven; yet we have nowhere read that he has any grant, by either divine or human law, whereby he at his pleasure can translate kingdoms, or punish kings, or adjudge respecting the lands of princes. Admitting that our consecration appertains to him, according to the right and usage of our ancestors, yet the power of deprivation or removal no more belongs to him than to any other prelate, who may consecrate or anoint any other of the bishops or kings of other realms. Be it granted that he has such power as this, but is it by the plenitude of this power that he can punish any one whom he asserts to be under his jurisdiction, without observing any of the forms of justice? For he has of late proceeded against us (as is asserted), not by the form of an accusation, for no fitting accuser appeared, nor did any accusation issue; nor by denunciation, for no lawful summoner was present; nor by mode of inquiry, for no complaint had been made, nor had any copy of the ecclesiastical matters to be inquired into been served upon us (if indeed there were any), when no persons were publicly produced by the judge.

“ He states generally that all these matters are notorious ; we as generally deny them, and there is no proof made by lawful witnesses that they are so. Were it permitted to every judge thus to become the accuser, by declaring that the crime was notorious, each judge might condemn each criminal without regard to law. False witnesses rose up against us (as it is said) in the council, but these were very few ; and one of these, the bishop of Galia, was our enemy upon notorious grounds, because we had lawfully condemned to the gallows his brother and nephew for treason ; his evidence therefore is inadmissible. Some of the others came from the furthest corners of Spain ; the bishops of Terrogonia and Compostella, who from their great distance from Italy are unacquainted with its affairs, and they having been suborned, cannot lawfully be accepted as evidence for our condemnation. But even if they were ; admitting that there are present these parties, the witnesses, the prosecutor, and the judge, one more is wanting, the criminal who is to be condemned ; and he must either be present, or absent by contumacy, if he is to be lawfully condemned. For (as we have heard) we were cited, though informally, when he [the pope] was preaching at Lyons ; for when we were cited, no mention was made of other matters or persons whatever ; and we ought to have appeared either by ourselves or our fitting attorneys, if justice were to be done. Certainly we ourselves were not present, and our absence was from a lawful cause ; and our lawful attorneys were not admitted to certify this on our behalf. Nor were we absent by contumacy ; for (not to insist that the citation was null and void, as we have stated) that citation did not express any definite term, as the law requires it should, as evidently appears by the copy thereof, which we have transmitted in our letters to the princes and prelates. The complete mandate of master Thaddeus de Suessa, the judge of our supreme court, and our faithful proctor, excuses this our contumacy, the authority of which is by no means impeached by the circumstance that the process against us relates to criminal matters, not to civil, and that in these our proctor cannot interfere, since the terms of the citation itself, which requires the presence of ourselves or our proctors, plainly implies a contrary meaning ; to wit, that we were to be proceeded against, not criminally, but only civilly, everything aforesaid being so limited as not to act to our prejudice.

“ But admitting that we were manifestly contumacious, that is no proper punishment for contumacy, since he who is delated or accused, if contumacious, ought not to be condemned by a definitive sentence before the judgment has been lawfully begun, and his cause examined into in private or in public. The canon and civil laws here draw a distinction in the cases of those who are contumacious.

swerable arguments in law by which it is defended, the terms of the very sentence pronounced contains nothing to show that its condemnation was directed against us who were absent, and not our proctor who was present ; and every law and all equity clearly demonstrate that such a sentence is in its very nature null. The proceedings contained in the sentence establish the obvious iniquity of the process and action ; but from these we are protected by truth which cannot be gainsayed, and by public documents, as is established step by step, beyond doubt, by the evidence of the bearer of this letter, and by the copies of the documents themselves ; although all and singular would not have warranted such a severe sentence (if a sentence so precipitately pronounced can be called a sentence at all) being directed against a Roman prince. Its precipitancy is manifest from the temper which notoriously had preexisted for a considerable time. For at least three days the pope would not admit into his presence the lord bishop of Frisingen, the beloved prince brother, H., the master of the hospital of St. Mary of the Teutonic knights, and master P. de Vinea, the judge of our supreme court, our beloved and faithful friends, whom we had at length sent to the council for the final conclusion of the treaty of peace ; for they having waited for the arrival of master Walter de Ocra, our vicar-chaplain (who with the sanction of the pope and some of the cardinals had been sent to us), a delay of twenty days ought to have been allowed for them ; but a delay of two days only was permitted, and that at the earnest entreaty of the nobles and many other of the prelates, during which he was absent from the said wicked proceedings at Lyons.

“ Another indication of his bitter and proud hostility towards us, appears in the sentence in which the punishment is awarded ; for in it the Roman emperor, the imperial ruler, and he who wields in himself the supreme power, is said to have been condemned for high treason ; and he, who by his imperial position is exempt from all laws, is ludicrously put in subjection to the law, the punishment of whom belongs not to man but to God, inasmuch as he has no temporal superior. As for spiritual punishments to be enjoined to us by sacerdotal penances, as well for despising the keys as for other sins of human infirmity, these we will not accept at the hands of the pope (whom, however, we are entirely willing to profess to be our father in spiritual matters, if he, on his part, will admit that we stand towards him in the corresponding relationship of a son), but will reverently receive them from any priests, and faithfully observe them.

“ All these considerations plainly evince how shamefully, how unjustly we have been held as suspected of wavering towards the Catholic faith ; which, we take God to witness, we firmly believe and profess without limitation, in all and singular the articles of the same, according to the discipline of the universal church, and the creed which has the sanction of the church of Rome.

“ Your prudence will therefore observe that this sentence, which is null, ipso jure, and these proceedings, which also, ipso jure, are null, ought not to be observed as affecting us, since they also redound to the injury of all kings, princes, and temporal dignities whatsoever. They have not been confirmed by any of the princes of Germany, upon whom depend our elevation to the throne, our continuance in it, and our deposition from it.

“Another matter requires notice; what issue may be expected from these beginnings? The first blow has been aimed at us, but be well assured that it will ere long be directed against other kings and princes; for the boast is openly made that if my power be but brought under their feet (which God forbid!) no resistance elsewhere is to be dreaded. Defend, then, the cause of your own kingdom, for it is involved in mine; look to the interests of yourselves and your heirs. Nor do we forget that we fully expect the constancy of your king at this time; for we remember the affinity which exists between us, that he will not only give no favour, publicly or privately, to our adversary, his legates, or messengers, but, on the other hand, manfully and powerfully help us to the best of his ability. He ought not to admit, on any account, any nuncio or legate, who is attempting to pervert to our disadvantage the mob which is subjected to his own authority. You may be assured that we have resisted these beginnings, for upon us the boldness of this audacious attempt has first manifested itself, and we have been aided herein by the right hand of the King of kings, which always accompanies justice, whereas this pontifical authority is extending its jurisdiction, to the deprivation no less of ourselves than of every priest. The aid of kings and princes should not oppose us herein, for their cause is one with our own, and their interest is as much at stake as ours is; the defence, however, which we have made herein shall leave no cause for apprehension in the minds of ourselves and of the other nobles of the earth. We take God to witness that we do this unwillingly; but the provocation required it, for we see that, in our times, the faith of Christianity is borne down by a mighty plague, and we fully depend upon your fullest and most active cooperation along with ourselves for its assistance. God shall demand an account of this at the hand of that person, who has been the occasion of a danger which threatens the destruction of nearly the entire state of Christendom.

“Dated at Turin, on the second of the kalends of August [31st July], in the third indiction.”¹

A.D. 1246. Matthew, cellarer of Melrose, was elected abbot on the morrow of SS. Tiburicus and Valerian [13th April], and on Ascension-day [13th May], he was solemnly blessed by William, lord bishop of Glasgow, in the church of Melrose. The body of lord Henry de Balolf² was removed from St. James, and honourably buried in the chapter-house of Melrose. Also Matthew, abbot of St. Servanus, was deposed, and Geoffrey, prior of Newbottle, was appointed in his stead. St. Edmund, the archbishop, was canonized.

¹ This masterly state paper is printed among the epistles of Peter de Vineis, i. 84, ed. Svo. 1740.

² Probably the Henry de Baliol mentioned in Dugd. Baron. i. 523.

A. D. 1247. Lord Thomas de Campa died and was buried within the house of Melrose. Also Philip de Peccokes, and Robert de Curri, and Adam de Lomokestun, were carried thither and buried, as also Adam de Baylof, who was buried near his father; and master William of Grenlawe, who was buried in the chapter-house. Also Ralph, bishop of Aberdeen, died, and was succeeded by master Peter de Ramesey. There was a change in the coin.

A. D. 1248. Louis, the most noble king of the French, and many others, as well nobles as of the lower orders, leaving their native country for Christ's sake, went to Jerusalem; and on their arrival at the island of Cyprus, they spent the winter there. In the same expedition the lord Patrick, earl of Dunbar, departed from this world; his son, lord Patrick, succeeded him. The lord John de Crauforde was buried at Melrose. Hugh, abbot of Kelso, died, and was succeeded by Robert of Smalhame, a monk of the same house. Nicolas, lord bishop of Durham, resigned his episcopal cure, and was succeeded by Walter de Kyrcham, the dean of York.

A. D. 1249. Gilbert, the lord bishop of Brechin, died, and was succeeded by his archdeacon Robert. Louis, the king of the French, abandoning the island of Cyprus, reached the celebrated town of Damietta, which he besieged manfully, and took after having slain many of the enemy; and gained an entrance into it with his army on the eleventh of the kalends of July [21st June]. Philip, abbot of Gedeworth, died; his successor was Robert de Gyseburne, a monk of the same house.

In this same year Alexander, the illustrious king of the Scots, was seized with a severe illness while he was on his journey to the parts of Argyll, and was carried to the island of Cerverei,¹ where (after he had received the sacraments of the church) his happy spirit was removed from this world, and associated with all the saints in heaven, as we trust. But as for his body, it was removed to the church of Melrose (as he had himself given directions in his lifetime), and was there committed to the bosom of the earth as befitted a king. At the time of his death he was in his fifty-first year, and in the thirty-fifth year of his reign; he died on the fifth day of the week, on the eighth of the ides of July, [Thursday, 8th July], leaving his kingdom to his son Alexander, a boy nearly eight years old, who, according to the custom of the kingdom, was appointed king, and placed upon his father's throne by the nobility on the third of the ides of July [13th July], and was honoured by all as the lawful heir.

Robert, abbot of Gedeworth, died; his successor was Nicolas, a canon of the same house.

A. D. 1250. After everything had so far succeeded prosperously with the army of the Christians, now their soldiers were delivered over to the pagans, chiefly in consequence of the pride of the French (so it was said), who gained a victory over them on the sixth day of the first week of Lent, [Friday, 11th Feb.], who inflicted a sad slaughter upon the Christians, not without a considerable loss to themselves. Having taken prisoner the king of France himself, they carried him off alive, and for some time kept him among them, treating him with the greatest respect, and afterwards they permitted him to return in freedom to his own country, after he had paid his ransom, and a truce had been mutually concluded. After the departure of the king, the pagans entered into Damietta, and when they perceived that their temples and idols had been overthrown, they were indignant beyond measure; and, breaking the truce, they put to death in various ways all the Christians whom they could find. Hearing this the king returned to Acre, and there required assistance from the Crusaders.

Robert de Muschamp¹ was buried at Melrose. Master Richard de Inherketyng was chosen and consecrated to the government of the bishopric of Dunkeld after the death of bishop Geoffrey. Frederick, who had been emperor, died. Adam, abbot of Dundraynan, died; and Brian, a monk of the same house, succeeded him.

A. D. 1251. Ralph, abbot of St. Edward's,² died; his successor was John, a monk of the same house, who had formerly been prior of May. At the same time Hubert, abbot of Kynlos, an aged man, refused to act as abbot, and he was succeeded by Richard, a monk of the same house.

In this same year Henry, king of England, and Alexander, king of Scotland, with the nobility of both realms, met together at York; and on Christmas-day the king of Scotland received his arms as a knight at the hands of the king of England, and the next day he married Margaret, the eldest daughter of the said king.

At this time Alan, the Doreward, and certain others were there accused to the king of Scotland, of an intention to betray him; whereupon many persons were compelled to resign their offices; and others, in the selfishness of their fear, consulted only their own safety, by basely returning homewards. But the king of Scotland, acting under the advice of the king of England, conducted himself with moderation and honour, and went home with his wife. The cause of the accusation was this. The king of England stated that he had been informed that the lord Alan, the Doreward (who was also at that time the justiciary,) and his accomplices, had despatched messengers and presents to the pope, with the request that he would legitimatise the daughter which he, the said Alan, had begotten by the sister of the king, in such manner that if any accident should happen to the king of Scotland, they should succeed him in the kingdom as its lawful heirs. Had he succeeded in this, he would without doubt have been a traitor towards the king and the queen.

A. D. 1252. John, abbot of St. Edward's, resigned his office, and Adam, the porter of Melrose, succeeded him. In the same year

¹ He was a benefactor to the monks of Melrose. See Morton's Monast. Annals, p. 267.

² The monastery of Balmerinach was dedicated to St. Edward, and its inmates were a colony from Melrose. See Spotiswood, p. 424.

Geoffrey, abbot of St. Servanus, and Robert, abbot of Dere, departed out of this world, and Henry, prior of Kynlos, was made abbot of Dere, and Michael, the porter of the same house, was made abbot of St. Servanus. His successor was John de Haddington, monk of St. Servanus.

A. D. 1253. William, the earl's son, died, and David, bishop of St. Andrew's, departed out of this world. Upon his death a dispute arose about the election, whereupon, an appeal having been made, the prior of St. Andrew's sent his messengers along with his canons to the court of Rome, and on the other side the king sent his messengers along with master Abel. But this master Abel, valuing his own promotion more than the honour of the king or the kingdom (so it is reported), caused himself to be consecrated bishop by the pope, and so he departed from the court.

Gilbert, bishop of Whithern, died, after whom Henry, abbot of Holyrood, was elected; and Ralph, a canon of the same house, was made abbot of Holyrood.

In this same year Henry, king of England, crossed the sea that he might settle the affairs of his continental possessions; he was followed by Alan, the Doreward of Scotland, who bravely attacked and overcame the armies of the king of Scotland, in consequence of which not only did he recover the friendship of the king of England, but he became in turn the accuser of his accusers and their accomplices, before the king of England, in many points. Hereupon there arose a great dissension among the nobility of the kingdom of Scotland, as will appear in what follows.

Robert Grostet, bishop of Lincoln, died.

A. D. 1254. Master Abel came into Scotland, the king's counsel first refusing permission, but afterwards granting it; and he was honourably received in his bishopric; but during this present year he was removed out of this world.

Master Gamelin, the king's chancellor, was chosen after him by the prior and convent of St. Andrew's, and was confirmed in the bishopric by the king and his counsellors.

The king of France returned home from Jerusalem; and Edward, the eldest son of the king of England, took to wife the daughter of the king of Castile, from whom he received knight-hood. Pope Innocent died, and was succeeded by Alexander.

A. D. 1255. There assembled at Edinburgh, to meet our lord the king, on the one side all the nobility of Scotland, and on the other Alan, the Doreward, and his followers, who were mightily increased in number, and pretended that they wished to have a conference about the settlement of peace, but their real object was to capture the lord their king. They there decided that it was imperative that a second meeting should be held at Stirling within the course of a few days, and that they would without doubt establish a peace; whereupon the king's counsellors and the other nobility departed, for the purpose of making the necessary preparations for so important an affair. But earl Patrick, and those others who were on the opposite side, entered Edinburgh castle in arms, and thrusting out all who were of the king's household, they seized their lord the king, and garrisoned the castle with their own troops, intimating to their other associates that they should make preparations to aid them in carrying off the king to whatever place they thought most expedient; and this they did with the greatest speed. For there had come to them out of England the earl of Gloucester (whose name was V.¹ de Clare), with a body of armed men, and by his advice they had committed the said treason; but he was followed by the king of England and his wife. When the king's counsellors and guardians had heard that he was taken prisoner, they were exceedingly distressed and astonished at such a treasonable act; and they resolved to call together an army, and to render him assistance, a decision which came to the knowledge of their adversaries: so they with a high hand carried off the king to Roxburgh, and taking possession of the castle there, they entrusted its custody to some of their number, who should hold it at their pleasure. They themselves, taking the king and queen, with them, went to meet the king of England at Wark, and after they had held a short and amicable preliminary conversation, the king of Scotland returned home the same day, but his queen remained there with her mother. Upon the invitation of the king of Scotland and his counsellors, the king of England came to Roxburgh upon the day of the Assumption of the blessed Mary [15th Aug.], where he was met by the king of Scotland, who received him with the greatest joy, and brought him into the church of Kelso with a great procession. Here, after having held a conference, he entrusted the king and the realm to the earl of Dunbar and his adherents, and so returned to his own country after a kingly banquet had been served. He took it ill that the bishop of Glasgow, and the [bishop] elect of St. Andrew's, and V.² Cumin, styled the earl of Menteith, and others of the nobility of the land, refused to affix their seals to a certain most wicked writing, which the said conspirators had framed and confirmed by their seals, and in which were contained many matters which would have worked for the dishonour of the king and the kingdom.

In the same year, on St. Stephen's day, which then fell upon a Sunday [26th Dec.], Gamelin was consecrated bishop of St. Andrew's, at his own see, by William, bishop of Glasgow, although the king's counsellors sent messengers to prohibit it. Henry, lord bishop elect of Whiteherne, was also consecrated by Walter, archbishop of York, which Walter died this same year, and he was succeeded by his dean, master Sewal. John, abbot of Holme, died; he was succeeded by his monk, Henry.

A. D. 1256. Lord Walleran de Normanvil was buried at Melrose. Richard, the brother of the king of England, was elected emperor of Germany, and Sewal was consecrated.

In this same year bishop Gamelin was outlawed by the king's counsellors, partly because he would not acquiesce in their wicked designs, partly because he scorned to give a certain sum of money as if for the purchase of his bishopric ; and as Scotland had cast him out, and England refused him a passage through her territories, he went by sea to France, and thence boldly proceeded to the court of Rome against his adversaries. Upon his departure, the king's counsellors pillaged the possessions of his see, and dilapidated them at their pleasure.

¹ Such appears to be the reading of the MS., but the name of the earl of Gloucester was Richard. See Dugd. Baron. i. 212, and Ford. i. 325. Wyntown, i. 384, is correct in this particular.

Peter, bishop of Aberdeen, died, and was succeeded by Richard de Pottern. Roger, abbot of Newbottle, died as he was returning from the [general] chapter, and was buried at Vallis Dei ; William, the prior, was appointed in his stead.

A. D. 1257. The king of Germany was crowned.

The king of England attacked the Welsh ; but being defeated by them, he returned home.

This year there came to the pope messengers sent by the guardians of the king of Scotland, who, on the part of the king, accused the bishop of St. Andrew's. After having heard and examined both sides, the pope with his own lips pronounced that the bishop was guiltless of all the accusations which had unjustly been brought against him, and said that he was most worthy of the bishopric ; and he excommunicated his accuser, and those who had plundered and invaded the see ; and he commanded Clement, bishop of Dunblane, and M., the abbot of Melrose, and N., the abbot of Gedewurth, to promulgate throughout the kingdom of Scotland the sentence which he had pronounced against the king's counsellors ; in the first instance, in general terms, with the tolling of bells and with lighted tapers ; and should they continue in their contumacy, then by name. They made this denunciation at Stirling ; and, after many admonitions, they repeated it by name (for they refused to repent) in the conventual church of Kambuskinele.

Now, when all the nobility of Scotland, of whom the leader was Walter Cumin, styled earl of Menteith, perceived that their king was the constant associate of men who had been excommunicated, and becoming apprehensive that the whole land would be placed under interdict, they made a rising, and, taking him out of their hands at Kinros, they restored him to his kingdom. The master-builder of the whole mischief, Alan, the Doreward, when he heard of this, became apprehensive of the consequences of his treason in laying hands upon his sovereign, and fled to the king of England ; but the other accomplices¹ were scattered, some in one direction, some in another.

A. D. 1258. Alexander, king of Scotland, came to Roxburgh with his army, to reduce into subjection the rebels and traitors who had been excommunicated. They asked for a truce ; and after having promised (but in treachery) that they would obey him and his laws, they fixed a day, at Forfar, upon which they would amend any act of delinquency. Having obtained this delay, they hastened to the king of England, and entreated that he would give them counsel and assistance against their opponents. In the meantime, the Scots and the Galwegians who were in the army ate flesh, not only during Lent, but even upon Good Friday itself; and on their return home they abundantly plundered the country.

About the same time G., bishop of St. Andrew's, was recalled from his banishment, and restored to his episcopal see. Clement,¹ bishop of Dunblane, died; after whom was elected master Robert, surnamed de Prebenda, the dean of the same church. Sewal, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by Godefrid, the dean of the same church.

About the Nativity of the blessed Mary [8th Sept.], the king of Scotland made a second expedition with his army against the said traitors; for he heard that they had arrived from the king of England, provided with troops and accompanied by some of the English nobility. So, while the king of Scotland was waiting for his army at Melrose, there came to him, from the king of England, the earl of Hereford, the earl of Albamarl, and John de Balolf. Their pretended object was to soothe the people, and to establish peace between the said traitors and their opponents; but it was generally reported that their true purpose was to lay hold upon the king's person once more, and carry him off with them into England. Of this the king of Scotland was aware, and therefore he fixed that the day of meeting with them should be upon the morrow at Gedeworth, in the forest of which a great portion of his army had already been assembled. He had heard that these messengers had despatched John Maunsel to the castle of Norham, along with a body of soldiers and the said traitors. On the morrow they met together at Gedeworth; and then occurred a lengthened conference, which lasted for nearly three weeks. During its continuance, Robert, abbot of Kelso, was removed out of this world, and a monk of the same house, named Patrick, was appointed in his stead. The Scots and Galwegians ravaged nearly the whole of that country. At the end of three weeks, when these messengers perceived that the Scottish army was now united and prepared to make a descent upon them, if they lingered, and that their forces were inadequate to oppose it, they brought about a peace between the traitors whom we have mentioned and their opponents; and thus amity having been restored, each one returned to his own home.

On Michaelmas-day [29th Sept.], William, abbot of Cupre, in the humbleness of his devotion, laid down the care of his rule in the chapter-house of Melrose; and the government thereof was entrusted to William, the cellarer of the same house. Walter Cumin, earl of Menteith, died; also our venerable father William, bishop of Glasgow, departed from this world on the vigil of St. Martin [10th Nov.], and was buried at Melrose, near the great altar, on the day of St. Brice [13th Nov.]. After him master Nicolas, archdeacon of Tevidale, was elected and confirmed by the king; after the Purification [2d Feb.], he went to the court of Rome to receive the rite of consecration from the pope.²

¹ Fordun, ii. 92, says he died in 1256. See also Keith, p. 173, where a double error may be observed.

² In the margin of the MS., nearly opposite to this entry, occur a few half-defaced words, of which ". . . et J. de Ros . . ." are alone legible.

A. D. 1259. Master Nicolas, the elect of Glasgow returned from the court of Rome without having obtained the rite of consecration, partly because he was unwilling to pay a sum of money which the pope and the cardinals demanded from him (for he did not wish to seem to have entered into the sheepfold save by the door), and partly because those who had accompanied him, apparently for his assistance, on the contrary opposed him with all their might. The ringleader of these was R., the bishop elect of Dunblane, who was so far blinded in his pride as to imagine that if the election of the other were quashed, he himself might easily be able to mount up to the see of Glasgow. In this, however, he was disappointed; for master John de Chyum was consecrated, and despatched from the pope, de latere, to govern the church of Glasgow. As for this R., he was sent off to the bishopric to which he had been consecrated. William, abbot of Newbottle, relinquished his pastoral care, to the government of which Adam, cellarer of Melrose, succeeded on the day of St. Vincent [22d Jan.].

A. D. 1260. Master John, bishop of Glasgow, (having asked and obtained permission from the king of Scotland,) entered into the kingdom; and having been presented to the king, was kindly received by him, and conducted to his see, where he was enthroned in state. Also A., abbot of Balmurinach, resigned the government of that establishment (which he could no longer retain, in consequence of his infirmity) to his successor Adam, a monk of the same house. Patrick, abbot of Kelso, resigned; he was succeeded by Henry de Lambeden. Walter, bishop of Durham, died, and was succeeded by Robert, a monk of the same house. Margaret,¹ the firstborn daughter of the king of Scotland, was born in England. Michael, abbot of St. Servanus, died, and was succeeded by his monk, John.

A. D. 1261. Pope Alexander died, and was succeeded by Urban. Also, Matthew, the sixteenth abbot of Melrose, on the vigil of St. James [24th July], in consequence of bodily infirmity, entrusted to his prior the custody of his seal, and thus bade adieu to the pastoral care. After his resignation, Adam, abbot of Newbottle, was unanimously elected by the convent, and installed on the day of St. Peter ad Vincula [1st Aug.]; and the government of Newbottle was entrusted to Wido, the porter of the same house.

A. D. 1262. H., abbot of Dere, was freed from the pastoral care of his flock, which was committed² In this year also died the lord T., the son of Raynulf, and Juliana his wife; their bodies were brought to the monastery of Melrose, and there honourably buried on Holy Thursday [18th May]. In the same year died Alan bishop of Argyll, and was succeeded by Laurence de Ergadia, a brother of the order of the Friars Preachers.³

SINCE (as we are told by Papias, in the third Distinction of his Elementary) Chronicles may be defined to be a narrative of past occurrences, or (according to another authority) we may style them witnesses for time, the explanation of truth, memorials of things worthy of preservation, and the messengers of antiquity—after there was laid upon me the care of writing these Chronicles, I have thought good to call to remembrance some miracles, appending thereto a narrative of subsequent events, of which some have been narrated by others, some are to be narrated by myself, but all have been omitted by those annalists who have had the charge of our Chronicles before myself. It is not fitting that these miracles, which God has wrought for the abundant merits of faithful men of true piety, men of reputation in the convent of the monks of Melrose, should be unrecorded in writing. Therefore I shall, in the first place, introduce the name and memory of a certain illustrious monk of this same monastery.

IN the days of Adam de Harcarres,¹ the venerable abbot of Melrose, there was another Adam, him whom I have just now styled an illustrious monk. He was by birth a Yorkshireman. It happened that he was one day in the orchard of this monastery (not without a reasonable cause), and as soon as he heard the first stroke of the bell which was being rung for evening service, he hastened to the church; and when he was some distance from it, he perceived that the postern door of the gate—which, when he had last passed it, was open—had now been closed, and securely locked; and at the same time the larger gate itself was fastened quite as firmly. He did not know what to do; and as he was standing before the gate, in much anguish of heart, lo! by God's means, that postern suddenly opened for him of itself, just as he had been wishing. From this we may gather how easily he entered into the kingdom of heaven, who was permitted to have the postern gate opened for him with so great readiness. O blessed Lady of the heavens! I cannot but imagine, in the lowliness of my conjecture, that this wicket had been opened by thee! For one day, as he was standing before thee, opposite the altar of St. Stephen, the protomartyr, it was granted him to see thee, not actually as upon the earth, not upon the wall, not dependent upon any corruptible matter, but, as the man of God related, he saw thee in the open and spacious body of the church, now in motion in the air, now standing motionless, according to thy pleasure, before him who there most devoutly loved thee, clad in a most beautiful but an exceedingly delicate and seamless garment, of the purest white. Thinking that no one noticed him, he then bent the knee; then he made frequent signs with the hand, all of them expressive of the joy which he experienced in the presence of the beloved one. These gestures were perceived by a monk who was standing behind him at some little distance; he privately moved his position, fearing that the anger of the holy man might possibly be excited against him, on the supposition that he would consider these motions which he was making were foolish and excessive. Coming afterwards to him who had rejoiced thus before the mother of God, he inquired of him what occasioned him so much joy, when, upon such a day and hour, he saw him rejoicing before such an altar? The man of God replied: "I entreat you, by the power of God and by the mercy of His mother, that, as long as I am alive, you mention to no one the vision which I have seen, and I will tell you of it." Having disclosed it to him, the monk promised that he would never reveal this vision to any one as long as his informant survived. But the monk asking why it was that he could not perceive the mother of God, since he was standing so near to both of them, the other answered thus: "The mother of God reveals herself to none but to those who for a long time have waited on her devoutly, and rendered to her such services as have in themselves the nature of good works."

Concerning this blessed man, it is worth while to relate one miracle more, which God performed for him long after his death. There was in this monastery of Melrose a certain ancient monk, named William de Duns, whose eyes were so closely sealed up with blindness, that his eyelids could not be opened, unless either he himself, or some other person for him, did so with the hand. After he had lamented his loss of sight for many days, at length he asked the person who had been appointed to take care of him, to conduct him to the tomb of this holy man, of whom I have lately made mention; for before his departure out of this world to Christ the blind monk had enjoyed the intimate regard of the other. So, when he had come to his sepulchre, he fell upon his knees and prayed, saying, "O master Adam, as I truly believe that thou hast loved God in this life, and that thou art with Him in the life eternal, after having been called from us to Himself, so I entreat thee to be pleased to offer up prayer for me to Him, that through thee I may be enabled to obtain the light of my eyes which I have lost, my sins demanding it. Remember, dear friend, how much I loved thee in this life, and that I did thee honour to the best of my ability." For this blind man had formerly been the sacrist of the monastery, and had very frequently supplied his friend with such necessaries as he required. After having prayed such and such like words, lo! a light of marvellous brightness entered at first into one of his temples, and, passing through the closed recesses of his eyes, went out by the other temple, as he himself informed me. This having occurred in a sudden manner, he rose up with his sight perfectly restored; and he returned from the tomb of the holy man without requiring the assistance of the guide who had led his steps thither.

Now that we have seen this preceding miracle respecting the holy Adam of York, it is fitting that I should recount a corresponding miracle connected with another monk of ours, whose name likewise was Adam, a native of Lewenax [Lennox]. It is reported, that so great was his holiness, that during the twenty years which he spent at Old Melrose, he was never seen or known to go into bed nor out of bed. The plain proof of this was, that it was clearly perceived that the straw, over which were placed the sheets of that pretended sleeping-place of his, remained constantly in the same unchanged condition for the whole of this space of time. But since it was God's good pleasure that this most excellent man should not fall into the sin of hypocrisy, the straw which was laid upon his bed sometimes—though rarely—crumbled into dust from old age; and then the man of God commanded that new straw should be laid upon the top of the old, just as if it was his intention to break through his custom, and to sleep upon his bed. He did, however, go to sleep; but the little time that he spent in sleep was passed by him in a sitting posture, or prostrate before the altar of the blessed Virgin, the mother of God; where also it was his custom to spend the greater part of the winter nights in playing upon the harp and singing songs (which are called "Molets"), written in honour of the holy virgin-mother. During the day-time he sat for the most part near the church-door, going daily through the psalter according to custom, and close by his hand there always stood a basket, in which there was such an abundant supply of loaves, that no poor man was permitted to go away from his presence either complaining or unrelieved, but he always carried something away with him. Therefore, as he himself used to say, he thought himself fortunate in having such a full store of provisions laid up for him by those poor persons who kept flocking to him; and this, by means of the bread which he distributed to them. The rich also came to him, and even the king of the land, that Alexander who lies buried within the church of Melrose, as well as many others, drawn by respect for his holiness, earnestly entreating that he would take as much of their wealth as he thought fitting, but this he very seldom consented to do; however, he sometimes accepted a few of their cows, that he might supply the poor with milk when they came to him. He himself had two cows belonging to the monastery, and they afforded a supply of milk sufficient for himself and his associate. The immediate cause which brought the nobles of the land to him was, that they might confess their sins to him and receive his blessing; and many persons thought that his holy benediction would profit them much.

A. D. 1260. Henry de Lamden, the chamberlain of the monastery of Kelso, returned from the court of Rome, bringing with him papal letters, the import of which was, that upon the production of the papal mandate, Patrick, the lord abbot, who at that time presided over the said monastery, should forthwith resign in favour of the person who delivered it, and whose name was Henry; and this he immediately obeyed. For upon the very same day upon which the said Henry entered the house of Kelso, without any further delay Patrick placed upon the high altar of that monastery the pontifical badges with which he had been invested; and these the aforesaid Henry forthwith assumed in virtue of the grant from the pope. Let him take heed as to the mode by which he entered upon that pastoral charge; for afterwards, whether by the anger of God or in his good pleasure we know not, he was carried off by a sudden death as he was sitting at his own table and had just put the first morsel into his mouth; and immediately after the second meal of the convent he was committed to the grave on the same day, possibly because they did not wish to watch around his body.

A. D. 1261. Our venerable father Matthew, the lord abbot of Melrose, was deposed in the chapter-house of Rievaulx, though he was absent; and this was done without the counsel, nay, without the knowledge, of a single living soul in Scotland; and his deposition in this sort occasioned much grief as well to the monks as the lay brethren of the monastery of Melrose, for in their opinion he had no fault in him which was worthy of such an act of deposition. The father abbot, however, was content that he should be thus dealt with, in consequence of some presentments which had been made against him, and which to him appeared to be valid. After his deposition had been announced, that same father abbot absolved, in the chapter which was held upon the day of his deposition, all the monks of Melrose from the obedience and the professions which they had made to him. Alas! that it should be so; for this good Matthew (who was a revered and open-handed man) had been the means of procuring for the house of Melrose some property and many comforts; it is through him that we have pittance-loaves upon the Fridays during Lent, when we fast on bread and water. It was he who built our large houses in Berwick, as also many cow-houses, many houses for oxen, and the great chamber for the abbot which stands by the bank of the river, as well as many other edifices.

A. D. 1263. Haco,¹ king of Norway, supported by a large number of ships, came by the western sea to attack the king of Scotland; but of a truth, as the same Haco admitted, it was not man's power which drove him away, but the power of God which crushed his ships, and sent a pestilence amongst his troops. Such of them as mustered to engage on the third day after the feast of Michaelmas [2d Oct.], God defeated and slew by means of the foot-men of the country. Thus they were compelled to carry off their wounded and slain to their ships, and to return home in more disgraceful plight than they had left it.

In this year, upon the day of St. Agnes [21st Jan.], the queen of Scotland (being then at Gedeworth), gave birth to a son, who, at his father's desire, was named Alexander, when he was baptized by Gamelin, bishop of St. Andrew's. And it happened that on the same day upon which the king of Scotland was informed that God had given him a son, intelligence also arrived that the king of Norway was dead. Rejoiced by these twofold tidings of joy, the king gave thanks to God, who exalts the humble and humbles the proud.

A. D. 1263. Elianor, queen of England, (who was believed to be the root, the originator, and the sower of all the discord which existed between Henry, the king of England, and the barons of his realm,) being apprehensive of the barons, went out of England; and she was followed, a few days afterwards, by John Maunsel,¹ the chief counsellor of the king, who was awed by the same fear. When they had crossed the sea and arrived in France, the said Elianor collected such a countless multitude of people from out of every nation, that they appeared to cover the whole face of the earth. Their intention was to attack England, and to destroy from off the surface of the land all who dwelt upon it. When they reached the sea-coasts of France, Normandy, and Flanders, they were forced to tarry there so long, that almost all of them were at last obliged by their wants to sell their horses, their saddles, their clothing, and nearly every single article of every kind which they had brought with them; for God directed that a very strong north wind should set in, and blow violently night and day, without intermission, for two months and more, so that they could not by any means cross over into England. Hereupon, perceiving that the power of God was decidedly opposed to them, every man of them returned to his own home at the end of the second month, with the exception of the many who died by the road.

In this same year the English barons, who for the last twelve months had been preparing themselves for a mortal struggle, laid hands, by right or wrong, upon whatever came within their reach. Herein they resembled fishes, who (as Aristotle¹ states in his fourth book upon Animals) devour whatever they can catch.

A. D. 1264. At the battle of Lewis, the barons of England (in conjunction with the army of the Londoners, and aided by Gilbert, earl of Gloucester) gained the victory over their king Henry and his eldest son Edward, shortly after Easter. On the day after the battle, the barons gave both of them—I mean, the king and his son—into the custody of Simon de Montfort. In this same fight, two of the Scottish nobility, Robert de Brus² and John Cumin,³ were taken prisoners, and placed in close confinement in the castle of Dora. The disagreement out of which originated this struggle between the king and his barons, had its beginning and its end in this, that the king and his queen Elianor, the mother of prince Edward, had for a long time retained near them and favoured the foreigners, so far as to be guided by their counsels; and this contrary to the interests of the kingdom and the wishes of the inhabitants, whose remonstrances they rejected—one may almost say, despised. It was for the purpose, then, of entirely expelling these foreigners from the kingdom of England that the said battle was fought; for so powerful had they become against the inhabitants of the land, that they had caused many persons to be disinherited. After the barons had gained the victory, as we have related, forthwith all the foreigners banished themselves, except Simon de Montfort, and a few others who remained with him; and all these had faithfully promised by an oath, made upon the Gospels, that they would adhere to the party of the barons. This Simon was earl of Leicester, and the son-in-law⁴ to the king; he was an excellent man, wonderfully skilled and circumspect in making arrangements for military affairs, and in carrying them out into execution after they were planned. He was a good soldier, and also had been knighted; and from these considerations the barons selected him to direct them, as well in their counsels as in the war. By birth he was a Frenchman, descended from one of the most noble and powerful families of the whole of France; and he did not degenerate from his ancestors, but equalled them. He was a man endowed with heavenly wisdom, and amply provided with knowing precautions. It may be worth while to introduce an account of one of these.

A few days before this Simon set out against the king, with the army of the Londoners, whom he was about to lead to the battle which we have mentioned, he caused a cunningly-devised chariot to be built, the whole of the outside of which he had covered with iron, and into it he thrust two of the citizens of London: they were old men, of some influence, but they were opposed to him and to the whole city; for they frequently dissuaded the people from going out with Simon against the king. And therefore it was that when this came to the ears of Simon, he shut them up as ⁴ He had married Alianor, the sister of Henry III. Dugd. Baron. i. 572.

I have described, as a punishment for this wicked, foolish, and obstinate advice. Now, when the said army was about to leave the city, Simon took with him, in their carriage, these crafty orators, in order that they might not cause the city to surrender to the royal interest while the army of the Londoners was employed in the expedition against the king. The chariot had a little narrow door, through which these aged persons could go out and in, but still under watchful custody, when the necessities of nature so required it. On the evening of the day previous to that upon which the battle was fought between the king and the barons, when it grew towards nightfall, the entrance to this chariot, through which victuals used to be conveyed to these burgesses, was so firmly closed up by Simon's orders, that from that time they had no longer any opportunity whatever of issuing forth. Round about that chariot Simon had caused to be hung those standards which are called penons, that by this means the king and his army might be deluded into the belief that Simon was in the chariot; in which, however, the true Simon was not: for at that very time he was lurking about in woods, which were surrounded with mountains and steep rocks, at some distance from the town of Lewis, somewhat towards the direction of the south-west of England, in company with the earl of Gloucester, and some few others of the nobility; along with whom were the barons of nearly the whole of England, and very many renowned knights, many horse-soldiers, and foot-soldiers innumerable, amongst whom was a large body of cross-bowmen and slingers, who in the day of battle would occasion great confusion to the king's army by the showers of stones which they would throw, like thunderbolts, from those slings of theirs.

Among the noble persons whom I have mentioned, was the bishop of Worcester; he was afterwards banished, because he had so far reversed the episcopal character as to put aside the meekness of the bishop, and assume the warlike qualities of the knight, wearing at his side a sword instead of carrying the pastoral staff, and having a helmet on his head instead of a mitre.

So, when the king went out to battle against the barons, those who were the more forward in the army noticed those penons which I have mentioned as having been hung round about the chariot, and they pressed forward to reach it. The Londoners had already told the royal army that within the chariot sat Simon, whom they had appointed as their leader in the battle; and they added: "He has resolved to keep behind us, and he refuses to go out with us to fight for us as he promised. We are very suspicious about him on this account, for he pretends that he is so ill that he cannot mount his horse. In truth, we were apprehensive that he would betray us to the king, his son-in-law, and that he would attack us on the rear, along with the royal army; and therefore we have caused this very strong chariot to be made, so that if we must needs die in battle, he shall die with us; for we will put plenty of fuel beneath this chariot in which he is, and burn him within it."

Emboldened by such words, those persons whom I have described as being the more forward in the royal army, pressed forward to reach this conveyance in which Simon was, as they believed. Whilst they were engaged with all their energies in attacking this fraudulent vehicle, and made no progress in their assault, they lost ground and courage at one and the same time. As for the chariot, it was of great assistance to the Londoners; for, whilst very many of the king's army were endeavouring with all their strength to break it open, the lives of those whom I have described as the Londoners, as well far off as near at hand, were saved; for the barons had not as yet come up and joined them, and therefore, during the delay occasioned by this interval of suspense, while the assault was being made upon this deceptive conveyance, many of the Londoners were not engaged in the action. So when the army of the barons came up, and assailed the king's army on the rear, a large proportion of the Londoners who had been drawn up in front of the king's army (such of them especially as were near the chariot) preserved their strength unabated; and they afterwards fought all the more effectively against the exhausted soldiers who were on the king's side. This deceptive piece of baggage had been constructed partly with the very intention that it might act as a device which should prove for the security of the inhabitants of the city of London; for though the royal troops were earnestly engaged in assailing it with all their energies, they entirely failed, and at the same time the Londoners continued fresh and vigorous, and ready for the battle. The effort was continued for nearly the whole day, almost to the eighth hour, by the royal troops, who attempted from every point of assault to make themselves masters of this chariot, in which, as they believed, Simon was cooped up; and in so doing they lost many men of undaunted courage, many others of their knights were grievously wounded, much labour was lost, and much anxiety bestowed upon it, as one troop followed another. The best of the king's forces seemed to have been seized with madness, and they rent the air with the wildest shouts, crying out, "Come out, Simon; come out!" Their impression was that Simon had some device by which he could open the door from within, so as to be able to leave the carriage; and therefore they kept crying out continually, "Come out, Simon, you devil! come out of the carriage!" Whilst they continued these shouts at the top of their voices, at last the two citizens of London, who were within, contrived to make them understand that Simon, whom they were seeking, was not there, but only two unfortunates, whom Simon had entrapped out of spite to the king; "for he was apprehensive," said they, "that the city of London would have been surrendered to the king's service by our means, had we remained at home in our houses, whilst the others went out to fight against the royal troops."

No man in his sound senses ought to believe that this Simon was a traitor, or to call him one. He was no traitor, but a most devoted respecter and most faithful protector of the church of God which is in England, and the shield and defender of the nation of the English people, and the enemy of the foreigners, whom he drove out of this country, though he was himself by birth a foreigner. It was an act of justice, then, not of treachery, when he carried off in the chariot these two Englishmen, who thwarted his efforts by their endeavour to prevent the city of London (which is of greater importance than all the towns and chariots in the world) from rendering assistance to the barons; since they could not by any means accomplish the expulsion of the aliens, unless they had the most valuable cooperation of that important city; deprived of which, they would have been surrounded on all sides by the power of the king's party. Since these old men whom we have mentioned ventured thus singly to oppose themselves to the united sentiments of the whole city, they ought, by God's just judgment, to have perished outside the city, if they and their chariot had been burnt in the fire.

In this battle many thousand men were killed, foot-soldiers and horsemen. In this battle, Richard, earl of Cornwall, the brother of king Henry (who a few days previously had defied the barons to battle, styling them traitors to the king and the kingdom), being apprehensive of his life, took refuge in a windmill,¹ and there he barred the door upon himself. When it was near eventide, on the day of the battle, the barons came up to it, and called out loudly to him, "Come down, come down, you wretched miller! Come out of your mill—come out!" They upbraided him with his timidity and cowardice, and added, "It is a great misfortune to you that you must be called a miller—you who so lately defied us poor barons to battle; and when you defied us, no less glorious title would serve you than that of the king of the Romans and perpetual Augustus!" For a short time previously he had been the king of Germany, in consequence of which he styled himself "the perpetual Augustus and the king of the Romans." So Richard at last did come out of the mill, and the barons carried him off, after they had put him in chains; and then they placed him in close confinement. But it happened that as he was exceedingly wealthy, he was liberated, about five months afterwards, by the payment of a large ransom, no less than seventeen thousand pounds of sterlings and five thousand pounds of gold—a sum worth having.

A. D. 1265. During the reign of Alexander the third, the king of the Scots, Reginald de Roxburgh,² a monk of Melrose, (a man celebrated for his eloquence, and possessed of excellent discretion,) set out for Norway, to which he was despatched by the same king. His object was to obtain possession of the isle of Man (which was formerly called Regio), and which, with the many contiguous little islands, had belonged to the realm of Scotland. On his arrival there he was received with the greatest distinction by the king, who summoned all the nobility of the land to meet him for the holding of a conference, and there he discussed with them the matter of these islands. During the progress of the treaty the king remarked that it was very important for the preservation of peace that these islands should be sold to the king of the Scots; and when the nobles heard this remark, some assented to it, and some opposed it. The wishes of the former prevailed, however, and at the last they came to a unanimous conclusion that they should be disposed of to the king, as he wished. Thus an agreement was entered into between these two kings, by which composition this is the import: that the king of Scotland shall pay to the king of Norway, each year for ever, one hundred pounds of sterlings, as a recognition of the homage made to the king of Norway by the said Alexander, king of Scotland. For greater security, the latter paid down at once to the king of Norway four thousand marks, and the king of Norway received these at one payment in the isle of Orkney, by the hands of the bishop of that island, for the islands aforesaid.

² The Norwegian account of this expedition, printed by Johnstone, designates the ambassador as an archdeacon, and gives a different colouring to the whole transaction.

A. D. 1266. Reginald, the monk of Melrose already mentioned, returned from Norway, having accomplished to his entire satisfaction every article in the negotiations for which he had been despatched. With the sole exception of this monk, none of the children of the Scots had ever been able to bring about this result; for he was a wise man, and exceedingly clear in his exposition of the Scriptures; and he has truly earned for the house to which he belongs, the constant grace and favour of all future kings of Scotland, unless it should happen that these sovereigns should prove ungrateful, and return evil for good to the house of Melrose, which may God turn away from the heart of every Christian king!

In this same year the chancellor of the lord king of Norway followed this monk into Scotland, and brought with him the treaty already mentioned.

A. D. 1267. Adam de Maxstun, the lord abbot of Melrose, was deposed in the general chapter; he it was who had deposed from the chapter of the order a son of his own, the abbot of Holm, and thus provoked the same punishment of deposition upon himself which he had inflicted upon this said abbot of Holm; and he well deserved his sentence, for he had procured the deposition of his own abbot, Henry, who, however, was restored to his former seal by the chapter. The deposed abbot of Melrose was succeeded by John de Ederham, the master of the lay-brethren of the same house.

James, abbot of Citeaux, was deposed in the general chapter; his deposition was procured by the convent of Citeaux, but afterwards this same deposed abbot became archbishop of Narbonne, in Gascony, and he was succeeded in his abbey by John, abbot of Savigny.

Adam de Smalham, the lord abbot of Dere, a monk of Melrose, voluntarily laid down his office, preferring the sweets of Melrose, of which he had already had experience, to the duty of presiding over the petty convent of the monks of Dere; in the warmth of whose devotion he could never feel any assured confidence. Hugh, the cellarer of the same house, succeeded him.

A. D. 1268. Edward, the eldest son of the king of England, having escaped from the custody of Simon (which he did one evening when he went out into the fields for recreation with a very few persons of Simon's household), joined himself with many of the marchmen who had long held lands under him in the marches [of Wales], that is to say, in the county of Chester, and by them he was welcomed with immense joy. After having remained with them for two days, he hastened to the earl of Gloucester to procure the liberation of his father; on his arrival the earl received him with sufficient respect. While they were eventually discussing the king's detention in the hands of Simon, and the prince begged the earl to aid him in the liberation of the king, the earl promised that he would place all his army at the king's disposal. He collected his troops with the greatest expedition, and he marched with all haste against Simon, along with Edward and his marchers. At this juncture Simon was at Hereford, and the king was kept there in constraint along with him.

Now, as soon as Simon discovered that the earl of Gloucester was on the eve of marching against him along with his army to attack him, he sent without delay to such of the nobles as had continued firmly attached to the side of the barons in the late battle. As soon as this message reached the nobles and barons they were aghast at the unexpected escape of Edward, and they immediately went to Simon, whom they joined at Evesham, upon the day appointed. Using that degree of caution which the circumstances required, Simon had left his son (who bore the same name) in one of the chiefest strongholds in all England, that is to say, in the castle of Kellingiswurthe [Kenilworth], together with many of the armed nobility, that if it so happened that Edward should attack Simon the father in the front, Simon the son and his army should assail Edward in the rear. And this plan would have been carried out, but for the treachery of a certain knight, who betrayed to Edward the arrangement of Simon the elder respecting the large body of armed men who were in the said castle.

Having intimation beforehand, through the intelligence of this traitor, that the armed men were to march out of the castle while it was yet daylight, and that they intended passing the night in the town which was close at hand, he that very night despatched a detachment from the army which he had collected to intercept the troops of Simon, who (as we have mentioned) had the day before, unfortunately for themselves, abandoned the castle, meaning to sleep in the various dwelling-houses which were in its immediate proximity. Their object in leaving the castle was this, that when they rose up from their beds early in the morning, they might have the comfort of a satisfactory bath, which would make them all the fitter for the battle on the morrow; for the town afforded much more accommodation for the purpose of bathing, in the way of baths, than they could expect to find within the walls of the castle. And this was the motive which induced them to abandon that strongly-fortified castle of Simon's; and when the knight (whom we have mentioned as having betrayed the circumstance of their departure to Edward) made him acquainted with the fact, he did not fail to state that baths had been provided for them within the town.

So it was, that towards midnight a loud cry was raised throughout the whole town when Edward's soldiers rushed in upon the sleeping troops of Simon. When they heard the noise, they were beyond measure terrified by the outcry; for fear and trembling, terror and apprehension, seized them when they heard the noise of horses, and their riders calling out for them, and saying, "Get up, get up, rise from your beds, and come out, ye traitors! You are the followers of that deep-dyed renegade, Simon, and, by the death of God, you are all dead men!" Thus these persons who had been so shamefully betrayed all rose up, and escaped by the backs of the houses, leaving behind them their horses, their arms, their clothes, and all the baggage which they possessed. Had you been there you might have seen some of them running off entirely naked, others with nothing upon them save a pair of breeches, others in their shirts and drawers; and of all of them there were very few, perhaps not one, who was so fortunate as to be able to dress entirely. Many of them carried off their clothes under their arms; and just as they had hurried out of the house in the hottest haste in this plight (God in his infinite mercy giving them their lives), Edward's armed soldiers rushed in and made plunder of the horses, and armour, and everything else which (as we have said) had been left behind them by the fugitives.

In the morning the foot-soldiers, who the day before had followed at the tails of the knights' horses, clothed themselves in the armour of those noblemen who had escaped, and mounted their horses. You might there have seen the accomplishment of the prophecy of the Preacher, "I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth." [Eccl. x. 7.] When all these rascally fellows came to Edward, well armed, and riding upon the horses of the noblemen, he rejoiced with an exceeding great joy; and so Edward marched with a large army towards Evesham, against Simon.

When he had come within two miles of Evesham, Simon came out to oppose him; hoping where there was no hope. For, as I have already mentioned, he had trusted that his son Simon (who had fled with the others) would join him, and assist him, by attacking Edward on the rear; and so he went out, with the little army which he had. It marched forward boldly; but all who were with him, before going out to the battle, had made confession, and had communicated in the viaticum of the holy Eucharist. Edward had six or seven men, where Simon had scarce two.

Then the powerful and terrible army of Edward, and the insignificant troop of Simon de Montfort, joined in battle; the latter being preceded by that bold knight, Guy de Balliol, carrying Simon's standard. Close by him was Simon's eldest son, Henry, a gallant knight, who had been so named after king Henry. It was he who struck the first blow in the battle; the blow was returned, and he was the first of the many who fell there and died, for he was pierced by several mortal wounds, inflicted by various hands. On the side of Edward very few fell, on account of the multitude of the soldiers who were on the side of the conquerors; but on the other side nearly all were slain, along with Simon himself, because their numbers were so few, and they were so soon exhausted. A few only escaped, by surrendering to Edward's soldiers, and laying down their arms. That Guy, whom I have lately mentioned as a valiant Scottish knight, might then have been saved from a temporal death, but he would not; he was killed, as well as a great number of the English nobility, who had come out to fight for justice to England; and of the rightfulness of their cause no greater proof could be given than that afterwards frequent miracles were wrought, as well by Hugh Despenser, the chief justice of England, (a man most just and equitable in every decision, as well in regard to the poor as the rich,) as also by Simon, and some others, who kept their faith to God, even to the death, for the sake of justice to the realm of England; and this they had rightly undertaken, to preserve against the foreigners, and even against the king himself, who had wrongfully kept them back (as we have already mentioned) from receiving the remission of their sins at the hands of that holy man, Robert Grossetete, bishop of Lincoln, in the edict made respecting the battle of Lewis. Since then they were fighting for a just cause, they died in justice; and therefore, after their deaths, some of them were permitted by God to work miracles, and so to preserve for themselves glory and veneration; in consequence of which it is believed that they are reigning with God in glory. Amongst these valiant heroes was Roger de Rewle, a companion of the Guy whom we have mentioned, and who also, like him, was killed.

As for king Henry (who, by his undue partiality for foreigners, had inflicted an injury upon England), he went out in arms to engage in this battle against Simon, in order to restore justice to England, wearing, however, the armour of some other person; I might have said that the king had gone out to fight for the justice of England, unless his escape from the battle, and his restoration to his kingly power, would have enabled him once more to have collected aliens against born Englishmen, and so the last error should be worse than the first. It seems then to have been the intention of the barons that the king should die along with them, should it have become necessary that they should fall in the battle in which the king was engaged; their plan was that he should be unknown to his own adherents, and should fall under the heavy weight of their blows. Being unable to fight like the others, he kept calling out at the extent of his voice, "I am Henry, the old king of England;" swearing sometimes "by the love of God!" at other times "by God's head!" and constantly affirming that he was the king; and he exclaimed to the men who were striking at him, "Do not hit me, for I am too old to fight." It was his use and wont to swear such oaths as these. As he was making use of these exclamations, they took his helmet from off his head; and discovering by his countenance that he really was the king, he was removed out of the battle, and on the day following he was restored to his kingdom, to the great satisfaction of the enemies of Simon and the barons who had been killed. A few weeks afterwards, when the king was enabled to act according to the uncontrolled wishes of himself and some of his nobility, he outlawed from his kingdom his own sister, the wife of Simon, along with her daughter, a most beautiful damsel, who afterwards married the prince of Wales, and three sons of the same Simon.

Thus, upon the death of Simon and Hugh Despenser, and the other nobles of the land, there was a great lamentation among the people of England; but this was afterwards turned to equal joy, while the mighty acts of God were shone forth in the precious death of his saints. For God gave many miracles of the undoubted holiness of Hugh: at his tomb the blind received their sight, the lame walked, and many were the wonders which God performed for him; a privilege which he had obtained from God, for he was always truly just, to the best of his ability, as far as regards his dealings, both towards God and man, a course from which he could never be withdrawn. So therefore, after his death, God worked divine wonders through him; for during his whole life, up to the hour of his death, he always held the accurate line of truth.

But did the Almighty God leave Simon unprovided with the power of working miracles? ¹ Certainly not. Therefore we have thought it good to introduce here an account of a few of these miracles, which were done by him through God's power.

It happened that immediately after he had been killed, and stripped of the arms in which he had been clad, some of the sons of Belial came up and cut the hands and feet off the corpse; and it is respecting one of the hands that the following narrative is told:—There was a certain man belonging to the frontier lands [of Wales], an inhabitant of the county of Chester, who had been in the battle of Evesham, along with Edward, and who, after the battle, became possessed of this hand of Simon's, about which I have been speaking. He sent it to his wife by a companion as wicked as himself, thinking that she would be rejoiced at the death of their enemy, of which this hand was a conclusive proof. The attendant, on his arrival at his master's farm, did not find the lady of the farm at home, but he hastened on to the parish church, where she was, which was situated at no great distance from his lord's dwelling-house. When he arrived there, carrying in his bosom the said hand, wrapped up in a cloth, he went up to the lady, and, whispering in her ear, he told her of the death of Simon, and he added, "See, here is a token that he is killed," intending to show her the hand which had been cut off. But the woman, not liking to be put to the blush, or perhaps fearing God, refused at that time either to look at the hand or to touch it, although the retainer of her husband earnestly urged her to take what he had brought, and keep it in her own possession. As he was entreating her to act thus wickedly, the lady said, "Keep it covered up until divine service is finished." Obeying his lady's commands, he withdrew, and took his place among the crowd, that he might hear the mass; and it happened that at the elevation of the blessed host, as the people were lifting up their hands, this attendant also lifted up his hand to adore the Lord, whom the priest had just elevated. Behold! the hand of the holy man, whom this servant of a bondsman of the devil was carrying, was, without any assistance whatever on his part, raised up above his head by God's power, in order that thus the supremacy of his exaltation might be perceived all the more clearly, towering above every head, even that of the tallest man of all the multitude there assembled. And having thus adored the Lord of Majesty at his elevation, as I have stated, when [the priest] bowed himself before the altar to adore the Lord, quicker than language can express, it again stooped to the same place whence it had gone out, not without the power of God, for the cloth into which it had been sewn was found to be as firmly stitched together as it had been at the first, nor could the bearer discover any alteration in it. Deliberating upon the wondrous nature of this miracle, the woman, of whom I have spoken, feared God, and said to the attendant after mass had ended, "Carry back to my husband that hand which he has sent me by you, for it shall never cross my door." For she had been stricken with a wonderful astonishment at the sight of such an unprecedented and unheard-of miracle; and therefore she said to her husband's retainer, "The man, whoever he is, who cut off that hand, deserves the severest punishment;" and then she privately told the messenger about the vision which she had seen; for although many of the faithful of Christ who were there present had seen it, yet this privilege had not been vouchsafed to all of them; and she commanded him honestly to tell his lord, when he returned to him, about the vision of which he had heard. Then the servant hastened off upon his return to his master, carrying the hand with which he had been entrusted; for he had not even entered the house of his mistress, as she had vowed, in consequence of the hand of which he was the bearer. Hence it appears that she was one of those foolish virgins, who, in their folly, rejected this hallowed hand; yet this was not done without the counsel of God, who disposes every action. For that son of Belial, her husband, was unworthy to have in his house a hand of such exceeding sanctity; and so it was believed that it had passed over, by God's providence, to an owner much more worthy of it. But how or where it is, I am entirely ignorant; yet of this I am sure, and this I firmly believe, that at the daily elevation of the health-giving host this Simon, during his lifetime, was in the constant habit of raising up his hands with the most intense devotion, with the most earnest love towards Christ; and that he raised up his hands in this spirit of devotion, the surest and most infallible token which we can have is this, that, as has been recounted, his dead hand was raised up in adoration of the Redeemer of the world, who was born of a most clean Virgin. Hence it is that I call to remembrance the remark which occurs in that little treatise written about the battle of Lewis, to the effect that Simon was endowed with divine wisdom; for what can a man do in this life which is wiser, truer, and better, than to love, honour, and adore his Creator from his inmost heart? That Simon did this I doubt not, and therefore I conclude this miracle, and hasten on to recount another which the Almighty God did through his instrumentality. The hands of this man are surely much more holy in the sight of God than the hands of Scipio which Seneca adored, as appears in the last chapter of the twelfth book of a treatise "On the Twelve Degrees," of which Seneca himself is the author.

Close by a certain town in Northumberland is a celebrated house of the canons of the Premonstratensian¹ order, who there serve God. One of Simon's feet was carried to this house by a man of happy memory, the lord John de Wescy, the lord of the borough of Alnwick, the founder and patron of this house of the canons of which I have spoken. After it had remained here for several months, it was found that it was without any corruption whatever. To secure the continuance of such an extraordinary instance of incorruption, which had thus deservedly exhibited itself in the foot of this holy man, the canons of the same abbey (it is called the abbey of Alnwick, for it is situated near the town of Alnwick), out of reverence to God the Creator, made a shrine of the purest silver, in the shape of a shoe, for this foot of incorruption. This foot exhibited a wound, which was visible between its lowest joint and the joint which is immediately connected with it, which, whether it were made by a hatchet or a sword, I will not decide; for the person who cut off the foot of the holy man was not contented with the numerous mutilations which he inflicted upon the body of the holy man, but was unhappy until his cruelty vented itself by this additional wound on the foot. It happened that about this time a very rich burgess of Newcastle-upon-Tyne became exceedingly ill, so much so that he was nearly deprived of the entire power of motion. He could not even stir one of his feet from the bed on which he was lying; he could not raise his hand to his mouth; he could not discharge any bodily function whatever; nor would he permit any one to touch him, for such was the extremity of suffering to which he was reduced through this disease, which pervaded his entire body, that he preferred to die rather than to be moved from his bed, so intolerable was the burden of his infirmity. One night he heard a voice which said to him as he was dreaming, "Rise up to-morrow morning, and you will find that your disease is somewhat abated; go to Alnwick, and in the abbey of the Premonstratensian canons of that place you will discover the foot of Simon de Montfort; and from that foot," said the voice, "you will obtain an entire cure." Very early in the morning of the next day he found, on arising from his bed, his disease was to some little extent alleviated, as the divine voice had predicted to him ; but it cost him some considerable pain to mount his horse, but he did this, and as speedily as he could go, he went to Alnwick. As soon as he reached the house of these religious, he dismounted from his horse as he best might, and hastened without delay to visit the foot of the holy man. No sooner did these devout canons see this, than two of their number, that they might shorten the journey of this burgess to the place where the foot was deposited, for he was still exceedingly ill, and they were apprehensive that he could not endure the fatigue of walking thither; two of them (I repeat) reverently carried the foot, along with the shoe in which it was deposited, from the place in which it was usually kept to meet the invalid. Before he came so near as to be able to kiss the shoe, the merits of Simon were so effectual with God, that this man was permitted entirely to recover his health, simply by the sight of the shoe. Reflect, then, how great glory must exist in this foot of Simon, when it shall be reunited with the entire body after the general judgment, since the single limb was so effectual even before the judgment, that the power of healing shone forth even from the lifeless substance in which it was enshrouded—this shoe of silver; for the power of God thus invisibly issued forth from the foot, through the shoe, so as to make this sick man whole.

Nor was the other foot left without the honour of a miracle, as we may piously believe. This foot had been sent to Lewlyn,¹ the prince of the Welsh, who had entered into a treaty with Simon, the subject-matter of which has been open to suspicion, and on which I do not touch, on account of the evil surmises which are afloat respecting it. For Simon was open to some mistrust, for the whole of the royal jurisdiction was at this time in his hands, along with the person of the king, whom he was keeping in custody, with the advice of the barons. Now, because Simon had promised to give his daughter to Lewlyn, as we have already stated, (who indeed did marry her afterwards,) it was for this very reason that the other foot of the former was sent as a present to the latter; and this was done as an insult to both the one and the other of them, that by this compliment the prince might perceive how much the English hated him for his connexion with this Simon.

Now, about the hand of Simon, of which I have already made mention, I am uncertain whether it is that of which I have already spoken, or the other about which I have hitherto said nothing; but, as I have been informed by Thomas de Stangrife,² the lord abbot of the monks of Riveaux, a man of the most venerable sanctity, that one of Simon's hands is kept at Evesham, in a place of the greatest veneration, we may piously believe that it has not been left there by God without some miracles having been exhibited; for God does not so highly exalt one part of a man by honouring it with the power of working wonders, and yet leave another part of it without this same privilege. We must, therefore, believe for a truth (in my opinion at least), that as for the other hand and foot of Simon, respecting the power of which to work miracles I have been silent, God Almighty has indeed condescended to perform wonders by them, as was well pleasing to his Godhead.

Since, then, Simon may be believed to have been well pleasing to the Almighty Lord, he may rightly be compared to Simon Peter, the prince of the apostles. In this comparison which I am about to institute between these two Simons, if the reader shall chance to discover something which is not quite satisfactory in his opinion, I entreat him to correct what is amiss, and to pardon the folly of the offender. It is not my meaning, in this comparison of the inferior Simon with the superior, to prefer him or any other Simon in the world to the prince of the apostles; but whilst I recal to memory that earl Simon, in regard to his faith, was inferior to the faith of the apostle, yet I may compare the miracle which God performed for the one, with a like kind of miracle which God performed on account of the other. My comparison, in short, runs thus: If the disease with which this burgess was afflicted, thus hastily abandoned him when as yet he was afar off from the foot of this Simon, and had not come sufficiently near to kiss it, as we have stated above, may not this Simon be compared with him who was his superior (without disrespect to the apostle), the fear of whom, as he was hastening to the house of a certain rich man, expelled, even before he crossed the threshold, a most cruel devil from the daughter of that individual, by which the girl had been tormented from the seventh year of her age until the twentieth? I repeat it, may not a comparison be fairly instituted between this greater Simon and Simon de Montfort? In the one instance, the devil fled out of the young woman, as Simon was on his way to the house; in the other instance, the demon of his infirmity fled from this burgess with all speed, as I have already stated, before he could reach the foot of that other Simon. There is a miracle on each side; but the lesser miracle belongs to the lesser personage. It was a more striking wonder that the devil—which had so influenced the girl that, in the extremity of her fury, she tore, scratched, and bit all who came near her, and whom (as we are informed) the same evil spirit had instructed, that she disabled some and killed others—should be cast out, to the glory of Christ and Peter, as Simon Peter was on his way towards her house, as appears towards the end of the eleventh book of the History of Clement. Thus, then, the greater miracle must be awarded to Peter, and the less to Simon, whom I have styled Simon the Less; for the malice of the evil spirit who was expelled from the sick burgess was one thousand-fold less than the savage ferocity of the devil who thus wildly raged in this young woman, as is evidenced by the continuance and degree of the fierceness of each of them respectively.

For the second time, I entreat those persons who may read what I am now about to write, in instituting another comparison between these two Simons, if I award the superiority to the one over the other, not to be angry with me if I consider that the narrative which follows entirely eclipses its predecessor. For what is there more excellent amongst mankind, or more reasonable in itself in the whole nature of things, than that one thing should be compared with another, provided it be done with justice? This is done in justice if this comparison of the man have immediate relation to God; for Simon Peter said, when he had passed the middle of the night—"I now awake up willingly, so that sleep shall not again return to me; and this I do, because it is my custom to call to mind the words of my Lord Jesus which I have heard Him speak. Out of love to them I stir up my mind, and exercise authority over my thoughts, that I should watch over every word of my Lord, which I recal and retain in my memory by pondering upon them. Thus, then, while I desire to deliberate in my heart upon the sweetness of the words of my Lord, the custom of watching has grown upon me by the Lord's favour. In such an unspeakable manner as this has the older habit of my mind become changed into a newer custom." This he says, towards the beginning of the second book of the History of Clement.

The Simon whom we have already mentioned may most properly be compared with this Simon Peter. A comparison cannot be fairly instituted between two objects unless they be placed in juxtaposition. Thus, Simon de Montfort may be compared with Simon Peter (the only one with whom he may be compared); for after he had made oath with the barons, by the king's directions,—the king himself having sworn in like manner along with Simon, nay, rather before Simon, faithfully to stand to the decision of the barons at Oxford, which had been enrolled by the wise men of England,—he began to deny himself, so to speak, and, like Simon Peter, to watch all night; and, in adherence to this custom, he used to rise about midnight, at the warning of some bell, which no one heard save himself, if it be permitted to describe God's providence as a bell, for it never failed him after he had commenced this custom. A wax taper was his bell, which it was his wont to light each night as he went to bed; and God so adjusted this taper, with reference to the length or shortness of the night, as the case might be, that, when it reached the point which indicated midnight, immediately he arose from his bed, as if awoke by God, and yet so noiselessly, that none of those who were sleeping near at hand either heard him or were aware that he had so risen. Long-continued custom enabled him to do this with the same precision as if he had been awoke by the most accurate timepiece. Thus, habitually shaking off the inclination to sleep until cock-crowing or early dawn, his example herein corresponded with that of Simon Peter; for, from that hour at which he arose during the night until the night of the following day, sleep never closed his eyes, exactly as was the case of Simon Peter. How beautifully does the one Simon herein correspond with the other! for, while the one continued in earnest prayer before God, night after night, so did the other spend each night in continually meditating upon the words which he was about to announce to the unbelieving people on the ensuing day. While Simon was thus in watching and prayer, he knew by heart the primer, the psalter, and other prayers, which he repeated during the night with alacrity and devotion; for he was not forgetful of the love and the commands of his Creator. We may well believe, therefore, that in doing these things, he did what was well-pleasing in the eyes of the Almighty Creator; especially if that was true (yea, rather because it was true) which his private attendants in his bedchamber reported of him, namely, that all day long and all night long he was clothed in haircloth. So great was his temperance in his diet, so praiseworthy was his frugality in his clothing, that he did not exercise himself in great matters which were too high for him; but whilst he was with those of his own household, he was contented with a russet garb: even when associated with the nobility of the land, he seldom wore a scarlet dress, but most generally clothing of a blue or brown colour, possibly that they might the less suspect that his under-garments were of haircloth; for he was apprehensive that some such report had got abroad into the world.

Once more, what can I say about his thrift, so frugal, and therefore so praiseworthy, as that was, which he exhibited in the midst of wealth so abundant and luxuries so profuse, but this—that herein his scanty self-indulgence may be compared with the example of Simon Peter? His clothing, too, may be compared with the mean dress of that same Simon Peter, whose sole nourishment was bread and olives, and it was only upon rare occasions that he indulged in vegetables and bread. The clothing of this Peter was nothing more than a tunic and a cloak; and he himself affirmed that these two garments were sufficient for him. About these matters, see the eighth book of the History aforesaid, towards the beginning.

Furthermore, let us observe the nature of the moderation which dwelt in Simon the soldier. You must observe that the character of moderation is this, that it takes neither too much food nor too little, but always holds a middle course between the two—between the excessive and the deficient. Now, Simon never exceeded the accustomed measure prescribed to him by his frugality, either in his eating or his drinking; and therefore he deserves to be styled moderate, as is further demonstrated by his habit of early rising, in which he always persevered, as we have already described. Those who slept along with him did not arise, but spent nearly the whole night in bed; but they got up with an impaired digestion, and surfeited with excess of sleep, nothing of which kind occurred to our Simon. No excess of sleep could be noted in him, for his moderation was great. Thus we may find an example of holy moderation in Simon; for in him temperance in sleep accompanied temperance in diet, as is said by the most holy Bernard. We have shortly before this had an illustration of the moderation of Simon Peter; for, to continue the extract which I have already made from his own words, “We (that is, I and my brother Andrew), from the time that we were boys, were always in a state of poverty.” Observe here, the moderation of Peter commences with the early dawn of poverty, which was afterwards adorned in the school of Christ with the moderation of true holiness ; so that these two Simons might appear to be companions in the matter of moderation, due regard being had to the superiority of the apostle, whose moderation springs from the words of our Lord Himself, who said, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness" (Luke xxi. 34), two sins which were very far distant from both of these Simons. Thus Simon, the scholar of Christ, could have said to Simon, Christ's soldier, had they been contemporaries, as he said to his disciple Clement, in the passage above referred to, "I wonder at this, and praise you for it, that though you are a man of great wealth," (for pope Clement was of imperial family, just as earl Simon was of a kingly family,) "yet since you have come among us, you have so easily changed your habits, and adapted yourself to our mode of life, which uses only what is necessary for the poorest, and ignores pleasures." Nor is it to be wondered at, that those persons who enter upon the path of righteousness for God's sake, obtain from Him the gift of a perfect moderation, which never swerves from the measure of sober moderation ; for we read that there exist some brute creatures, which have been endowed by God with the gift of such entire abstinence, as never to touch anything for their food which is of a corporeal substance, like as other living things do. Thus Solinus mentions, in his book "On the wonders of the world," (chapter clxiv.) when speaking of a quadruped called the chamelion, that such is its nature, that it takes neither food nor drink, and is supported solely by imbibing the air, which it is constantly sucking in ; and yet, according to the testimony of Pliny (Book viii. chapter xxiv.), it has flesh, and blood, and entrails ; and he adds, that its head and cheeks are fleshy, and that the blood of its whole body lies in a small tail with which it is provided ; and yet, though it is a very large creature, as he himself states in his Natural History (Book xi. chapter xxxviii.), there is nothing in its inside but a hollow cavity ; and we cannot suppose that it is independent of the air, for, according to the same authority (Book viii. chapter xxxiv.), its mouth is always gaping after the support which it derives from the air—nor, indeed, has it any other. Other living things, worms, for instance, live without bodily food. There are some of them which are to be found in a province near the Torrid Zone, as the letter of Prester John informs us, and these are called salamanders. The only fitting residence of these important worms is the fire, and from it they derive their support. Distinct from these salamanders are others which belong to other provinces : they are not only good for nothing, but they are venomous ; and therefore they spin for themselves little coverings of silk, within which they conceal themselves, like as do the other worms which produce silk ; and from these cocoons are made the garments which are worn by kings and nobles. The only mode of cleaning these garments is by putting them in a strong fire. I suppose that the garment of which Pliny speaks (Book viii. chapter xlvi.) was one of these ; his words are, "There is a certain kind of dress which resists sword and fire."

Having seen, then, that there exist creatures, who in their moderation and abstinence surpass all that man can exhibit, we have no cause for wonder if we discover that Simon obtained from God the gift of moderation to such a degree that he never exceeded so far as to use anything which was superfluous; for even the camel refuses to advance one step beyond the length of the journey to which he has been accustomed, nor will he carry more than his usual load; concerning which see Pliny, (Book viii. chapter xix.) This excellent habit may well be compared with the virtuous moderation of our Simon, which by no means suffers by the comparison; concerning whose shirt of hair we have now something to say, the sanctity of which must be acknowledged. For if, as Pliny says (in the eighth chapter of the same book), there is a healing virtue in the bristles of the camel,—by bristles, meaning hairs,—much more ought the hair shirt of every saintly man, which is made of the hair of a camel, or of some other animal, to be revered for its holiness. Here compare the hair shirt of this valiant Simon the knight, with the tunic and cloak of the most holy fisherman, of which we have already said somewhat; and, unless I am much mistaken, you will find that the sharpness of Simon's haircloth inflicted upon the wearer a punishment no less sharp than the bare cloak and tunic of the more illustrious Simon produced in him. I cannot imagine that the garments of the latter would need to have been censured for their newness; I should suppose that rather they were old, not new, and therefore thin and chilly; and in consequence he would be no less pinched by the winter's cold than scorched by the heat of summer. When placed under the influence of the burning sun, in such a dress, must not he have been oppressed with its burning heat? Assuredly. It might possibly be suggested that the thinness of this garment would afford him a cool protection against the heat, as he wandered about from nation to nation, preaching to them the kingdom of God, and so was exposed, while so doing, for many a weary day, to the burning sun of summer. There was no lack of austerity in each of these Simons, arising out of the excess of their love for the eternal life after which they yearned. And so, indeed, Simon Peter says of himself in the eighth book of the Itinerary of Clement, "My mind is fixed not upon the things which are present, but upon those which are yet to come; and therefore I have no delight in that which is present and visible." Nor had Simon the earl any pleasure in such like gratifications; and therefore he said that he would never draw back from the cause which, for God's sake, he had justly undertaken, the defence of England, neither for life nor for death, "since," as he added, "I am about to die for it."

That which more than anything else occasioned the death of this Simon, was the faithful oath which he had made for England; for from the day upon which he took it, he ever afterwards began to grow more strict in his mode of life, until the day of his death, as has before been stated. Up to this period he had not refrained from the society of his own wife, but henceforward he estranged himself from it, following the example of Simon Peter, of whom it is believed that he wholly debarred himself from the endearments of the married state; his wife being in the habit of following behind the crowd of the disciples of Peter, along with the mother of Saint Clement and the other holy women, as is stated in the eighth book of the Itinerary of Clement.

At this time, as I have remarked already, Simon wore a hair shirt. You might have heard grave and religious men, of different orders, saying everywhere throughout England (some of them came into Scotland, and made the same observation), that after Simon was dead, they would quite as willingly visit his tomb, for the purpose of their praying to God, as they would go to Jerusalem for the same purpose. This was in consequence of the austerity of his life, as demonstrated by the haircloth which he wore; for those who were the chamber-fellows with him had mentiond to some of their more intimate friends that Simon used a shirt of hair, and that he took pleasure in so doing; for there is nothing hidden which shall not be revealed. Another reason was, that he had taken in hand the most righteous cause of defending the inhabitants of England. There were others who said, that if, at the time when they were speaking, Simon had fallen for the sake of right (as he afterwards did), they would quite as readily have gone to his sepulchre, there to pray to God, as to the great shrine of the holy martyr Thomas, in which he reposes at Canterbury, endowed by God with many miracles, and adorned with precious stones. The remark which they made in their conversation with each other was not devoid of sound reason; for no less did Simon die in a just struggle for the lawful rights of the realm of England, than Thomas had formerly done for the lawful rights of the church of England. Each of them had died in his own day, clothed in the penance of haircloth—a penance which sooner than any other leads a man to God—that so they might put on incorruption through means of the penance thus voluntarily assumed by God's inspiration.

After the illustrious death of this Simon, the Friars Minorites, whom he had always loved as became a religious man, and who also were acquainted with the inmost thoughts of his heart in many respects, adopting his life as the outline of their narrative, published a history out of his excellent actions, consisting of lessons, responses, verses, hymns,¹ and other matter appertaining to the honour and respect due to a martyr; but as long as Edward survives, this compilation does not attain that acceptance, by being chanted within the church of God, which was anticipated.

There were some persons who lightly esteemed this holy man after his decease, but they died a disgraceful death. One of them was a canon of Alnwick, who, after he had one day been undervaluing Simon, very unnecessarily (at this time the earl's foot had not reached that house), discovered next morning, when it was time to rise from his bed, that he had not a single eye left him in that wicked head of his ; for on the previous day he had sworn by God's eyes, that Simon was a traitor to the king of England and his nobles. No wonder, then, that his eyes dropped out of his head, God thus punishing him for Simon's sake. In each eyehole there was a deep and a ghastly hollow. The man died suddenly on the same day.

John, bishop of Glasgow, died at the city of Meaux, in France, and there he was buried ; and in his stead William Wiscard, the king's chancellor, was chosen ; and being still bishop elect at the time when Gamelin, bishop of St. Andrew's, died, he was chosen to become the occupant of that see. His nephew, Robert Wiscard, the archdeacon of Lothian, became the elect of Glasgow, and was afterwards consecrated as its bishop.

Another accursed servant of the devil, who had cut off the private members of this holy man Simon, died a most horrid death two years after he had committed this great crime ; for, being in Scotland, he was drowned in the large and deep river of Tay, which falls into the sea near the noble town of Perth ; and when they would have taken him out of the water, it was discovered that a couple of frightful crabs had fixed their claws so firmly into his belly, that they could scarce be removed. His unhappy corpse, after it was dragged out of the river, ought to have been buried with the burial of a horse : for in some places (in the region of Agrigentum, for instance) horses of a good breed, out of respect to their pedigree, are buried in a grave, and over them is placed a pyramidal tomb ; as appears from Pliny's Natural History (Book viii. chapter xlv.). I was wrong, however, in saying that this wretched man, of whom I have just now been speaking, ought to have been buried like a horse ; for he had less of nobility about him than a horse has, which deserves a noble burial-place : for it is remarked, in the same chapter, that a rich emperor made a tomb for his horse, and a poem was composed in its honour. In the same place it appears, that when Alexander the Great was building his twelve Alexandrine cities, he named one of them Bucephalia, after his horse Bucephalus, which he buried there when it died, and gave its name to the city in which it had thus nobly been entombed. This horse well deserved such an honour ; for it had carried its master Alexander in safety through the dangers of many a terrible battle, as Solinus states in the hundred and seventy-third chapter of his book "On the wonders of the world." This horse was taken by the beauty of Alexander ; but I rather think that it was by its attachment to him, while he was still a youth, as Pliny tells us in the same place. My reason for speaking of its attachment to the youth Alexander is this, that it threw every one who attempted to mount it, save its own master, Alexander. Solinus mentions that there have been other horses who would not condescend to carry any but their own master ; and there are many other things mentioned to the credit of these animals, such, for instance, as that they shed tears when their masters died. What an affectionate and noble creature is the horse ! Also, it is stated that they starve themselves to death when they lose those masters to whom they are attached. Did not I fear that it would be wearisome, I would dilate upon their affection. Now, when we remember the respect thus lavished upon horses, when they are buried in an honourable tomb, may not we feel some indignation that this person, who cut off the private parts of the holy man Simon, was interred in a beautiful field; whereas it would have been much more fitting had he been buried near the gallows, where robbers and other malefactors are laid, unless, indeed, he had repented him of the crime which he had committed against Simon?

John Maunsel died in the parts beyond the sea, in great poverty and distress. This wretched person had so large an amount of ecclesiastical revenues, that out of them he could spend eighteen thousand marks yearly. Hence he refused to accept even the larger bishoprics of England, partly because he held in pluralities very many of the richest churches in England, partly because he was incontinent. Speaking of a church which was moderately endowed, being worth twenty pounds, he said, "That paltry church will do for our hounds." Hence you may gather, that out of the proceeds of that church, bran, and meal, and other matters required for his dogs, were to be provided. This person was Simon's enemy and the king's chief counsellor; and he persuaded the king to break the oath which he had made to the barons, that he would be faithful to England, which the king did. Hereupon he [Maunsel] was despatched to the papal court to obtain an absolution,¹ by which the king might be released from the oath which he had made to the barons; and the king's petition speedily procured the absolution which he desired. Hence followed the first battle of which we have already spoken, begun by the king after he had obtained this absolution. But woe to the king's breach of faith! He had sworn that he would abide by the decision of the barons in every respect; and the barons had sworn that they would adhere to the same agreement, which they had faithfully made for the king and his realm. But as the king did not keep his oath, so it was maintained by many that this was the reason why the barons got the victory over him, since they had faithfully sworn to save the kingdom. To this oath Edward had never assented; and when, at a later period, he was in confinement, [the earl], as he was respectfully attending upon him at his meals, used to say to him, "My lord Edward² my service;" and Edward was in the habit of answering, being entirely ignorant that Simon was thinking of the death which he was shortly afterwards to undergo from the sword of the other.

About this time, Oliver, the venerable abbot of Driburgh, was despatched to Edward, on the part of his sister, the queen of Scotland; and when his arrival was told to Simon, he conducted him into the presence of Edward, leaving below and in solitude the canon by whom he had been accompanied, for at this time Edward happened to be staying in a chamber upstairs. So Simon, preceding the abbot, conducted him up the several flights of stairs, until they reached that in which was the person to whom he had been despatched. After they had saluted each other, they sat down together, and talked in friendly manner; but all the while that the interview lasted, Simon remained standing before them; and as he stood, he never once withdrew his eyes from them, but watched them most attentively; for he was apprehensive that some letter would be delivered to Edward, or some dangerous communication made to him on the part of those by whom the messenger had been despatched. When they had conversed together as long as they felt inclined, the abbot arose, and having asked for permission to do so, he withdrew; but now he was followed by Simon, who (as the abbot supposed) imagined that if he had gone in advance, then some letter of treacherous import might have been conveyed to Edward. The same apprehension influenced him as he was conducting the abbot into Edward's presence, for then, as has been remarked, he went in advance of the messenger; for had the abbot gone first, he might have privily dropped some letter, the import of which might have been dangerous. But this piece of precaution is scarce worth mentioning, when we have so many other instances of greater acts of prudence.

I shall now make an end of speaking about Simon, whose life, though it be not fully illustrated by my pen in matters of minute detail and great difficulty, yet, in what I have said, I need not fear either the reproach, the detraction, or the falsehood of the malevolent; for I have written nothing about him which I have not received from men whom I consider to be worthy of credit. If my statements are not believed, neither will that of St. Augustine, who tells us (in the eleventh chapter of the sixteenth book of his treatise "Of the City of God") that in his own time there was a man who had two heads, two breasts, four hands, one stomach, and two feet;—nor will he give credence to Orosius, who speaks (in the eleventh chapter of the seventh book of the "Ormetista¹ Mundi") of a boy who had four feet, four hands, four eyes, as many ears, and was born of a maiden;—nor to Pliny, who tells, in his Natural History (Book seven chapter five), about a boy, the child of a virgin, and whom the soothsayers commanded to be carried to a desert island;—nor to the same authority, when he informs us (in the ninth chapter of the same book) that an infant once returned into its mother's womb, and that one woman in one day gave birth to seven children;—nor to Isidore, who says (in the third chapter of the eleventh book of his Etymology) that some men are born with teeth, some with beards, some with grey hairs—that a woman produced a calf, and another a serpent;—nor to Pliny, when he affirms (as he does in the book already cited) that an elephant gave birth to a serpent. We have been constrained by the gainsayers to cite these examples against themselves; and I entreat them that no one of their number henceforward play the backbiter, lest if he does, so he may happen to experience some of those punishments which have already overtaken with a temporal death the adversaries of earl Simon. Simon was descended from warlike ancestors, and was himself no degenerate imitator of those who had gone before him; but he died in battle, fighting on the side of justice; as was the case with his father, his grandfather, and his great-grandfather, and his two immediate predecessors.

HERE ENDS THE TREATISE CONCERNING THE ILLUSTRIOUS SIMON DE MONTFORT.

JOHN DE EDIRHAM, lord abbot of Melrose, resigned his office of abbot, and was succeeded herein by Robert de Keldeleht, a monk of Newbottle, who had previously been abbot of Dunfermline, and chancellor of Scotland.

A. D. 1269. A very severe storm of wind drove out of his intended route that illustrious prince the king of France, at this time on his way to the Holy Land. He was thus carried into the Sea of Greece; and when he landed, he discovered that he was in the kingdom of Barbary, the king of which he subjugated; and he then laid siege to and took the metropolis, an important, warlike, and populous city. Upon this city, called Tunis,¹ and upon other of the towns of that district, the king of France imposed the payment of a large annual tribute. Its inhabitants worship One God the Almighty, but not Three Persons; and because they worshipped One God, and did not observe the Jewish Law, they entreated the French not to put them to death. There are two bishops within that region. After the region of Barbary had thus been reduced to the king of France, as the latter was returning homewards, in company with the king of Navarre, both of them died on the road; David earl of Athol,² also, died in that expedition. King Louis was succeeded by his son Philip.

Albin, bishop of Brechin, died, and was succeeded by friar William de Kilconceath, reader of the Friars Preachers of Perth.

The most pious king Louis, whom we have already mentioned, built that most famous monastery of the Cistercian order, called Regalis Mons. He did not, like the founders of other monasteries, endow it with landed property, but he arranged that it should be continually provided year by year, and at the most convenient seasons, with uninterrupted supplies of wheat, wine, and all other necessary commodities, which should be delivered by trustworthy agents at the places best adapted for their reception. This he did, in order that the monks of this place might entirely dedicate themselves to the service of God, and wholly abstract themselves from the world.

Wido, the lord abbot of Newbottle, resigned the government of his house; over which was placed Waldeve, a monk of Melrose, who had been the cellarer of the same house.

Lora, countess of Athol, died, and was buried at Melrose. John de Balliol died ; he was a lover of scholars, and out of his love towards God, he built a house at Oxford, to each of the scholars of which he made a weekly allowance of eight pence for their common table. There is in the same place another house for scholars, better than this last mentioned, where each scholar receives a weekly payment of twelve pence for his commons, from the gift of the bishop of Bath.

A. D. 1270. The lord Edward, the eldest son of the king of England, and most accomplished knight and soldier, proceeded to the Holy Land. On his arrival there, he took up his abode in a tower in the city of Acre ; nor did he set foot outside that city, to engage in any difficult exploit, save upon one solitary occasion, when he was preceded by a Christian spy, who was of the sect of the Suliani. These are Christians who reside, hermit-like, amongst the Saracens ; and as they live in the wilderness, they are allowed to continue unmolested. All hermits are held in high respect by all kinds of Saracens and pagans, out of the honour which they pay to that dweller in the wilderness, St. John the Baptist ; and him they love and honour with the highest veneration, because it was upon his festival that they gained their victory over the Christians. Now, this Sulian had come to Acre, to intimate to Edward that the inhabitants of a town called Caconia had gone out, according to the usage of that country, to feed their flocks and herds, and that they had pitched their tents in some well-wooded districts. The inhabitants of that town issue forth once a-year to enjoy themselves in the open country ; and after they have had the benefit of the fresh air, they all return homewards in one body. In his advance towards the tents of these holiday-makers, which were about three days' march distant from Acre, Edward kept himself concealed during the daylight in obscure or woody places, as he had been instructed by the Sulian ; for he was apprehensive of the multitude of the heathen, who would forthwith have crushed the scanty body of Christians who were with him, for he was supported only by a few of the pilgrims and some of the more influential inhabitants of Acre. He advanced by night marches, thereby misleading the infidels, who did not know his route. By this plan he arrived very early one morning at the spot ; and finding the Saracens, their wives, and children in bed, he slew them all with the edge of the sword, for they were the enemies of the faith of Christ. After the slaughter, he drove off to Acre all their flocks and herds, and removed all their baggage ; and of all the men who accompanied him, he lost but one, and he was an esquire, named Nicolas, who was in attendance upon a Scottish knight, called Alexander de Setun. This esquire, (who was mounted,) had turned aside from the main body of the Christians for a necessary purpose, carrying with him on his back the shield belonging to his master ; and he was immediately seized by a few unbelievers, who dwelt by the roadside, whom, had the Christians noticed as they passed,—which they did not,—they would have put to death. The esquire, thus carried off, was never seen again by the Christians from that day forward.

If that illustrious soldier, the lord Edward, had enjoyed the assistance of the Christians, whom that traitor to our faith, Charles, king of Sicily, the brother of Louis, king of the French, had withdrawn from him, he would have given ample proof of his knight-hood upon these heathen; for at that time he was the flower of the chivalry of the whole world. But, through the instrumentality of Charles, he had been defrauded of the help of several nations—namely, of Sicily, Apulia, Calabria, and Italy; for the avarice of the other urged him to accept a countless treasure from the pagans, before the arrival of Edward for their destruction. The money was paid down upon these terms, that Charles would give the Saracens the truce which they required, in order to prepare themselves against the Christians. They asked for an armistice of fifteen years for this purpose, and this was readily conceded by Charles; and he gave them, in writing and by oath, whatever amount of security they pleased to ask. So the traitor Charles returned home, and the treasure which he had thus wickedly obtained from the unbelieving people was placed in a strong ship to follow him; but the vengeance of God decreed that as the ship was entering a safe harbour, near a city which belonged to the Christians, while in the very port, the vessel was suddenly engulfed in the sand, and nothing whatever was saved out of this money of iniquity, although God's mercy granted a safe deliverance to all the men who were on board, all of whom escaped unhurt. And so the ship perished; but let Charles take care that he perish not eternally, if he be not in safety within the ship of the church; for the ship of the church is the unity of the church, from which unity, it would seem, that Charles had entirely departed when he gave the preference to money against Christ—over war against Christ's enemies, for Christ's sake.

After this, that true treasure of Christ, the lord Edward, returned from the Holy Land, having abandoned the idea of warring against the heathen, a thing which he could not carry on in consequence of the fewness of the number of the Christians. His intention, however, was, that he would never return to his own country, until he had, to the uttermost of his power, discomfited the pagans, provided he could obtain the cooperation of the Christian states. But having heard of the death of his worthy father, king Henry, who had always wielded the sceptre of the kingdom of England in peace and tranquillity, until he had been seduced (for he was an unreasonable man, although religious) by evil counsellors, the chief of whom was his own wife, queen Eleanor, to permit war to be waged against the barons of his kingdom, Edward was of necessity compelled to return home, to succeed as the lawful heir of the realm after his father, and as such to be crowned.

Adam de Kilconath, earl of Carrick, died at Acre, whose widow, the countess of Carrick, afterwards married Robert de Bruys the younger.

My pen willingly returns to that most valiant youth in the whole world, that illustrious soldier for Christ, Edward; for it would be improper were I to pass over in silence how, God Almighty assisting him, he delivered himself from being killed by a powerful Saracen. A section of the unbelieving nation of the Saracens, who resided in the immediate neighbourhood of Acre, understanding that lord Edward was one of the most illustrious of all the soldiers of Christendom, despatched to him a certain admiral, a man of great wealth and influence. Upon the arrival of this pretended messenger, he presented many precious gifts in addition to those of the same kind which he had already forwarded, and earnestly prayed that Edward would admit to his friendship and confidence such an insignificant personage as himself, for so he designated himself, although really a man of importance. He stated that he wished to disclose to Edward a secret which he could not divulge unless he were first admitted to his secure protection. He swore by God that his very soul's health was in Edward's hands; and he added, "I entreat you, suffer me not to perish." The other, having no guile in his heart, answered by saying that he would much rather that he and all the Saracens in the world were saved, than that they should be lost. Hearing this, the crafty deceiver fell down and kissed the knees, the hands, and the feet of him who spoke to him thus kindly, declaring that now he was far happier than he had ever been before, in being permitted to see the son of so mighty a prince; and he was loud in proclaiming the praises of this king and his son, and he said that there was not his equal in the whole earth, nor one so skilled in tournaments, and so successful over his enemies in actual warfare; and he added that if the whole of the Christian world would place him at their head, he would soon be conqueror of the universe as well as of the Saracens. He extolled the Christians in many ways; and then he whispered in Edward's ear that he wished to embrace our faith, "for this reason," said he, "because the faith of the Christians excels every other religion in the glory of its miracles." Edward was rejoiced at these words, and he replied by saying, "It will indeed be a great blessing to you if you will be baptized without delay, for it is part of our belief that whosoever is not baptized shall perish everlastingly with the devil; if, therefore, you wish to be saved, hasten to baptism, since you do not know the day of your death." The other answered, "Your advice is good, for I do indeed wish to be baptized: but I have a lawful wife and many concubines, sons and daughters, kinsmen and relatives, and my desire is that all these should receive the baptism of your holy faith along with myself; I should wish, therefore, that before I am baptized, I should discuss with them the nature of the faith which I am about to accept." Edward replied, "You would do well, however, to make haste about your own baptism, for you know not the hour of your death."

This admiral stood before Edward rejoicing, and being elated with his success, he gesticulated as if he were a buffoon; and then asking permission to retire, the unhappy wretch withdrew, overflowing with craftiness, frequently promising that he would lose no opportunity of returning to enjoy his company, and to take recreation along with him ; and this he did, constantly sending, as hitherto, large and splendid gifts and presents. Edward inquired of him why he so long delayed his baptism, and his reply was, that though he had obtained the consent of many of his friends for this step, "yet not of all of them," (he said,) "but I hope to do so ere long, by the assistance of the God of the faith of you Christians."

Being upon these terms of mutual confidence, neither of them entertained any apprehension with regard to the other ; and the report of this their great friendship at last reached the ears of the chief soldan of the Saracens. He sent for the admiral, and was very suspicious that his intention was to betray, as far as he was able, the whole of that nation, and when he had become a Christian himself, to deliver his countrymen up to the Christians ; and therefore he commanded him, as he valued his life and limbs, to appear at court upon such a day and at such a place. So great is the ceremonial which is there observed, that (as I was informed by the esquire from whom I had the present narrative) all who enter the palace for the transaction of any business with him, or to be admitted to an audience, kneel once outside the door of the palace, at the threshold ; once more when they have come within the palace ; they make a third genuflexion when they reach the middle of the palace ; and when they come into his immediate presence, they make a profound inclination to him, kneeling upon their knees. The said admiral came, and made his obeisances as is the custom of the country, and as others did. The sultan inquired if he had become a Christian, and whether he had betrayed the heathen faith to the son of the king of England. His reply was, that he had rendered more efficient service to the prince for the defence of their unbelief, than all the other pagans had done who for a long time past had been labouring for the accomplishment of that object. "And how?" said the soldan. The other replied, "You are terribly afraid of that prince ; but as for me, I have so won him over by my numerous and splendid gifts, so cajoled him with my presents, dealing herein with the greatest caution, that he is entirely at my disposal ; and now nothing further remains to be done with him, than to kill him whenever I please." And this assuredly he would have done, had not the goodness of God delivered this most religious Edward by his assistance. A few days afterwards this treacherous admiral¹

JORDAN FANTOSME'S CHRONICLE

OF THE

WAR BETWEEN THE ENGLISH AND THE SCOTS IN 1173 AND 1174.

HEAR a true story (may God bless you !)
Of the best sovereign who was ever in life.
A fancy has taken me to make verses, it is right that I should tell you them :

I hold him wise who corrects himself by others.
Gentle king of England, of the most bold courage,
At the coronation of your son do you not remember
That the homage from the hands of the king of Albany
You caused to be presented to him without having faith forsworn ?
Then you said to both : " May God curse those

- 10 Who would remove from you love or friendship !
Against all the people of the world, in strength and aid,
With my son remain, holding safe my lordship."
Afterwards between you and your son a deadly hatred sprung up,
Whence many a gentle knight has since lost his life,
Many a man has been unhorsed, many a saddle emptied,
Many a good buckler pierced, many a hauberk broken.
After this coronation and after this investiture
You filched from your son something of his lordship,
You took away from him his will ; he could not get possession:
20 Here grew war without love, the Lord God confound it !

A king of land without honour does not know well what to do :
The young sovereign did not know it, the gentle [and] good ;
When he could not accomplish his will on account of his father,
He thought in his mind that he would oppose him :
He went away secretly, passed a ford of Loire,
Till he came to Saint-Denis he would neither eat nor drink,
Told the king of France all his business.
They sent for him of Flanders,¹ Philip the warrior,
And Matthew² of Boulogne, that he should come with his brother.

- 30 Great was this meeting, you never saw greater.

Wrongly was the war made against king Henry,⁴

⁴ This line is wanting in the Lincoln MS.

- And held a great council of all his good friends ;
 About the old king of England was he so thoughtful (That) nearly by sorrow went out of his mind gentle king Lewis,
 When the count of Flanders had raised his face,
 And said to the king of France : “ Be not so thoughtful.
 You have great baronage, valiant and powerful,
 To make great damage upon your enemies.
- 40 In all your land it would be wrong that any vassal should remain,
 Who could bear arms, or might not be too old,
 Not to make you oath on the body of Saint-Denis
 That the war was wrongly made against king Henry.”
 Count Thibault ¹ of France arose from his seat,
 And said to the emperor where was his great baronage :
 “ Gentle king of Saint-Denis, rage seizes my body.
 I am your liege-man by fealty and by homage,
 I am quite ready to make war and to find a host ;
 I will serve you forty days in the first rank,
- 50 And I will do to king Henry, I think, such damage
 That it will not be repaired in all his life ;
 He will not escape it anywhere in plain or wood,
 If he give not back his heritage to his son the young king,
 The kingdom of England, if he will act wisely.
 You will leave him Normandy, if he appeases your wrath.
 If there is anything mistaken and if I have said any too much,
 Or anybody would prove it against me in his language,
 Behold me here in your court ready to offer my gage.
 This person is perjured to you, and seeks your shame.”
- 60 Already are of one accord the king and his barons,
 And send messengers through many regions ;
 King Henry they defy for those reasons,
 Put the fair lands to great destruction.
 In the month of April at Easter was the host of France summoned,
 And they ride into the marches, they display their banners.
 King Henry rides against them with spurs,
 And had in his company ten thousand Brabançons
 And many a gentle knight, Angevin and Gascon,
 Who will cause to those of France ire and contention.
- 70 Very great was the host of France which Lewis brings.
 To destroy the father the son takes very great pains,
 When he has conquered and taken him in war he will lead him to Saint-Denis ; ²
 But the king his father had promised him something else,
 That he shall see many a flag and many a horse of price,
 Many a shield lined white and red and grey,
 And many a joust made against his enemies,
 Before he should be in battle a recreant and conquered.
 The lord of England has in his heart a weight
 Since his son makes war against him, whom he bred from infancy,

² This line occurs only in the Lincoln MS.

- 89 [And sees that those of Flanders have led him astray :
They promised him the land of the English for certain ;]¹
He would rather have died than lived that he (his son) should have the power,
As long as he could strike with sword or lance.
He drew up his baronage with brave countenance ;
Goes against Lewis, the rich king of France,
Against the count Philip, of whom you hear talk,
And lord Matthew his brother, a knight of valour.
God helped much the father the day, when he advanced,
And showed a fair sign about his war ;
- 90 For the helpers of his son, in whom his hope most was,
Were this day routed without any delay.
It was Matthew the warrior, on whom came the lance ;
King Henry shall have no more fear of him.
The count of Boulogne has received a mortal wound,
Down to his spurs of gold the red blood runs :
He shall never recover, much though he try.
The more his brother grieves, and the more he is dismayed himself ;
And swears his oath, the precious wound,
Never with king Henry he will be appeased.
- 100 Now rides Lewis, so does the young king,
And Philip is put in great disarray.
The count Thibault of France shows great pride.
Soon king Henry shall know where to move himself :
The French raise war against him, the Flemings and the Capei,²
The earl of Leicester,³ and there are also all his three sons.
He of Tancarville⁴ in truth does not love him ;
One hundred knights at arms he brings in his retinue,
Who all threaten to put him in such a disarray
They will not leave him of land the worth of a palfrey.
- 110 Lords, by my troth, much marvel is there
Why his vassals desire so to deal with him,
[He who was] the most honourable and conquering
That was in any land since the time of Moses,
Except only king Charles, whose power was great
Through the twelve companions Oliver and Roland.
One has never heard in fable or in story
Of one single king of his valour and great power.
Although they all come threatening him, he swears by his head
He will not cease to hawk by the river side or to hunt his beast.
- 120 Now rides the count Philip with his great host,
And wastes Normandy by wood and plain.
You would never have heard king Henry once complain of it,
Nor ever seek occasion to stop the war.
Much had the young king done, who bathes himself so well ;
Still he has in his command the barons of Britany.

² The people of a place of Vermandois, which then belonged to the count of Flanders.

³ Dugd. Baron. i. 87.

⁴ William, the son of Rabel de Tancarville.

When the father heard it, he was sorry and angry,
 And swears his oath that wrongly it was ever thought,
 And said to his knights: "Lords, now hear me.
 Never in my life was I so sorry.

- 130 Rage seizes my body, I am nearly mad.
 The barons of Britany have already opposed me;
 To those who hate me to death they have abandoned themselves,
 To king Lewis of France and to my eldest son,
 Who come disinheriting me of what I possess.
 He would rob me of my land and fiefs and heritages.
 I am not so old, people know that enough,
 That I should lose land on account of my great age.
 With the still moon watch to-night,
 In order that neither the Flemings nor the natives of the land be in ambush.

- 140 The barons of Britany, you know it well enough,
 As far as Finistere, are in my power;
 But Raoul of Fougères¹ has against me rebelled,
 The earl Hugh² of Chester is bound to him:
 I will not fail to see them for the cost of fine and pure gold,
 If I could find them in their fortresses;
 And since our enemies are so confident,
 Then it is well to invade them with a great hatred.
 Craft is better than war against outlaws,
 Than bad assault, if they are discouraged."

- 150 His baronage replies: "You are full of goodness.
 All your enemies are entered into a bad year.
 Yours is the land, so defend it;
 Wrongly wars against you your son."

Now behold these knights gone down from the palace;
 And go to seize their arms quickly and forthwith,
 Put on their hauberks and breastplates, lace their ornamented helms,
 Take by the handles the Vianese shields.
 Then you might hear the old king Henry call God to witness:
 "Wrongly will the traitors have met me in the stubble-fields."

- 160 From the town are issued knights in array,
 Less than sixty³ thousand and more than sixty-three;
 There is none of them who does not think himself as good as a Welsh king.

Now rides king Henry with all his host,
 Towards Dol in Britany he holds his way.
 And said to William⁴ of Humet, when he was in the expedition:
 "Let us not talk of delay: behold their country.

Those of the castle have already seen William and his banner,
 And see that the Brabançons come all in the rear.
 See the Norman host who will make us retreat.

- 170 Normans are good conquerors, there is nobody like them:
 Everywhere we find it in story that Normans are victors.

¹ He succeeded his father in 1154, and died in 1196. L'Art, ii. 897.

² Dugd. Baron. i. 40.

³ In the Lincoln MS. "thirty thousand."

⁴ Dugd. Baron. i. 631.

Think of it, Sir Raoul, for the company is fierce.
 The young king who wars against his father has betrayed us,
 When he left the ways to be on the river.
 I see no means how we can defend [ourselves] ;
 They will receive neither silver nor gold, prayer will nought avail us."

Raoul answers to this : " Folly has no business here,
 Nor jest, nor joking, nor any levity ;
 But whoso knows good counsel, let him come forward and say it.

180 We have no fear to lose either life or limb.
 The old king conducts himself with very great folly,
 When he of Britany demands the seigniori.¹
 Threatens us for his possessions and his lands
 But he shall not go as his pride guides him.
 Such a counsel now let us take, without strife of anger,
 That we be not to-day dishonoured, nor the land misgoverned.
 This castle is not strong : let us not trust to it ;
 Let us go out against [them], so we will assail them."

Then they charged each other in the middle of the plain, 190 Lord William of Humet and those of his company.
 There is no knight of value who does not break there his lance.
 Whoever would joust against a companion, soon found there his match.

By force were driven together the barons of Britany
 Into their very fortresses ; there is none who does not then complain of it.

By force was in his castle lord Raoul of Fougères,
 Hugh the earl of Chester proclaims himself a miserable sinner ;
 Neither mangonel nor stonebow was able to serve them.
 The war which they have made shall be sold them dear,
 For now goes a messenger to king Henry the father,
 200 To Rouen in Normandy on a black horse used to rivers ;
 And told him what had happened to his fierce people,
 To the earl of Chester, to Raoul of Fougères.

Then he praises God the glorious and the glorious saint Peter :
 " Discomfited are my enemies : alas that I was not there ! "

He gets ready his baronage, in which he trusts much ;
 Towards Dol in Britany he has taken his way ;
 But when he was come there with his knights,
 Joyous he boasts of the fact to his followers.
 Those who were in the castle did not rejoice at all,
 210 They much fear his coming and dread his power ;
 They had not victuals enough to sustain their life,
 They have surrendered themselves to king Henry, he holds them in his power.

" Lords," quoth king Henry, " now counsel me :
 My son is in the wrong towards me, it is meet that you know it ;
 For rent perforce he will have from my estates :
 Reason, I think, there is none why it should be paid to him.
 From a man of my power it is not to be thus extracted :
 And that which is by force taken or gained

- Is nor right nor reasonable, so it is often judged.
- 220 To guard my franchise I am enough ill-treated,
 And by those of Flanders often annoyed ;
 So we do not want more to be damaged.
 You all together, lords, I pray that you aid me ;
 In pitched battle your strength essay,
 With all your might for me strive :
 Never you loved me, if at need you fail me.
 Earl Hugh of Chester along with you take.
 On Raoul of Fougères I will execute my will ;
 I will leave him quite free within his estates,
- 230 By this condition that he be my liege.
 If afterwards against me he rebels by any iniquity,
 He shall hold in Britany neither estates nor heritages.
 Arm, lords, your bodies ; ride quickly :
 My son is quite ready for the battle.
 The rent he demands, let us pay it with our swords
 And with keen brands and pointed darts.”
 For this news many are joyous and glad :
 They are the knights the valiant and polite ;
 And the earl of Chester is grieved and wroth,
- 240 Nor hopes in his life to be disimprisoned.
 Frightened are the French at the fierce tidings
 The heart of the bravest trembles and staggers ;
 But he comforts them who leads them on.
 Ire he has in his heart, his blood boils.
 For counsel he goes to his most loyal men,
 In romance he dictates a letter, with a ring seals it ;
 The messengers of the young king before him he calls :
 It was king Lewis who gave the message.
- Depart the messengers who bear the letters,
- 250 They pass the salt sea, the kingdoms traverse ;
 The forests, the plains, the dangerous fords they pass,
 They come to Scotland and the king they find,
 On the part of the young king Henry the writings present.
 Now shall you hear the words which there were written :
 “ To the king of Scotland, William,¹ the best,
 To whom our lineage was formerly ancestor.
 The king Henry the young sends you by love,
 You must remember me who am your lord.
 It seems to me very marvellous, and I have fear in the heart,
- 260 Of so rich a king, of a man of thy valour,
 Who has such strength of people and such vigour in himself,
 That you will not help me in war, if you like, at first,
 To war against my father, thou and thy counts.
 I will give thee the land which thy ancestors had,
 Thou never hadst from a king so great an estate in land,
 The land beyond Tyne, under the heavens I do not know a better,
 You shall have the lordship in castle and in tower ;
 We will give you Carlisle, that you may be stronger,

¹ William the Lion, who succeeded to the throne 24th Dec. 1165.

All Westmoreland without any contradiction,
 270 That you help me with strength and readiness.
 Drive away those who hold these lands."

Now has the king of Scotland in his heart great sorrow
 When he hears the command of the young king,
 That he owes to him his homage against all people ;
 On the other hand he sends him greeting as to a relation,
 That he will give him his land which belongs to his estate,
 Which all the kings of Scotland held in their life-time ;
 And to the old king his father he owes likewise
 Homage and service, allegiance true.

280 It is not right that for promise he should act so boldly
 That he should knowingly destroy the land of the old king,
 Before he has claimed his inheritance.
 If he means to contradict him, then let him do his pleasure,
 Let him render his homage without pretext ;
 And when he has rendered it to him, and if he takes it well,
 Let him in any court deny the covenant ;
 For the will of the prince is held as judgment.
 Then held king William his plenary parliament ;
 From the sages of his land he wished to have counsel,

290 If he should to the young king keep his oath.
 There is none to contradict him or to forbid him.

The king goes to consult with his baronage,
 Tells them the news which they heard of the king :
 The young one of England, who wars against his father,
 Asks him for the land ; but he still refuses it.

" I will tell by messengers the father, in Normandy,
 That he must give me back a part of my inheritance :
 That is Northumberland, which he holds in his power ;
 And if he will not do so and refuses it quite,

300 I owe him in future neither fealty nor friendship."

Answers earl Duncan,¹ and says as a baron :
 " The old king is reasonable, so let him have his right ;
 Do not seek any opportunity of committing an outrage.
 If he likes, you must serve him as his liege-man :
 Let him restore you your rights without any subterfuge,
 Then you will come to succour him with all speed.
 Fair word exhibited by reason is better
 Than threatening in asking for any gift ;
 And whoever does otherwise, seeks destruction,

310 His own death and his damage and his confusion.'

Earl Duncan has spoken very wisely ;
 There is nobody who contradicts him, to my knowledge.
 Then said the king himself, the barons and the people :
 " This counsel is loyal, and it pleases me.
 Let us send our messengers with this mandate,
 And let them do their duty like valiant chevaliers."

The messengers go, their horses they spur,
 They slacken their reins on the great paved roads.

- The horses are very good, which spring beneath them.
- 320 They come to Normandy, they do not stay long ;
 Find the old king Henry, address him wisely,
 From the king of Scotland their letters then they give him.
 Friar William Dolepene ¹ speaks the first,
 And said to the king of England : “ I am a messenger,
 From the king of Scotland I come to inform you :
 He is your relation, therefore you must love him much ;
 He will serve you in this business, you will not see him delay,
 With a thousand knights armed, before an entire month elapses,
 With thirty thousand unarmed (so I have heard them reckoned),
- 330 Who will give your enemies wonderful trouble.
 He will not ask the value of a penny from you,
 So that you will grant him his rights :
 That is Northumberland which he requires first of all,
 For nobody has such great reason to challenge it as he has.
 Now you see me here in your court, I do not require any future time,
 I will leave it to be decided by a single knight ;
 And if you will not do it, in order to disinherit him,
 Here I return you his homage, I do not seek to conceal it from you.”
- When the king of England hears the message
- 340 Of his cousin of Scotland, of his intention,
 He says to his messenger that he will do nothing ;
 He does not require, on answering, either stranger or relation :
 “ Tell the king of Scotland that I am not afraid
 Of any war I may have with my son at present,
 Neither of the king of France, nor of his people,
 Nor the count of Flanders who assails me often.
 I will make them enraged and sorry for their war,
 And I will give him annoyance, if God allows it me ;
 But tell his brother, David,³ my relation,
- 350 To come and help me with as many people as he has :
 I will give him as much land and as many estates
 As to execute all his demands to his satisfaction.”
 —“ Sire,” quoth the messenger, “ I make a covenant with you for it ;
 But give us leave to go in safety.”
- Then the messengers set out from Normandy,
 Find a good passage, do not delay there,
 They traverse England, they come to Albany.
 The messengers are wise, they do not care about amusement,
 Meet with nobody who does them harm or says any thing bad
- 360 From the sea of Dover as far as Orkney.
 Soon they will tell such a word of war with rage
 For which they also shall weep who have not heard it :
 “ Sire king of Scotland, God save thy baronage,
 Thy body and thy courage and thy great retinue !
 From the king of England I return as a messenger :

¹ “Dolipene,” MS. Lincoln. If it were lawful to hazard a conjecture, it would seem that here we ought to read D’Olifent.

² David, earl of Huntingdon, was brother of William the Lion. See Dugd. Baron. i. 609.

Now hear his mandate, do not make light of it :
 He marvels much at you, that you have madness in your body ;
 He considered you a wise man, not of a childish age,
 As one whom he loved best, without showing any injury.
 You should not have required from him such an outrageous deed :

- 370 You ask him for his land as your inheritance,
 As if he were imprisoned as a bird in a cage.
 He is neither a fugitive from the land nor become a savage,
 But he is king of England in the plains and the woods.
 He will not give you for his need in this first stage
 Increase of land, this is in his language ;
 But will see whether you will show him love and relationship,
 How you will behave, as foolish or wise.”
 Then you might hear those knights, the people young and wild,
 380 Swear a strong oath and exhibit courage :

“ If you do not war against this king who beards you so,
 You must hold neither land nor any lordship ;
 But must serve the son of Matilda in bondage.”

- Now the king of Scotland hears that his people oppose him ;
 He had not Engelram¹ the bishop, the best of his clergy,
 Nor earl Waltheof² does not venture
 To counsel war (he well sees that it is folly),
 So that the king himself often opposes him
 By the suggestion of those who love folly ;
 390 And swears his oath, “ God the son of Mary :
 The war will not the less take place because of your cowardice.
 You have enough in treasure, goods and property :
 Defend your land and seek aid for you ;
 And, if you will not do so, in all your life
 You shall not have of my land the value of a clove of garlick.”

- Thus answers him the earl : “ Restrain this inclination :
 I am your liege-man, so were my relations.
 We know nothing of war : therefore I fear.
 To begin strife there must be deliberation :
 400 You should not trust to foolish enticement,
 Nor put faith in the folly of foreign people.
 If good can come to you, they will often gain ,
 They will not lose much, if it turns out unfortunately for you.
 The peasant says in proverb, and says very truly :
 ‘ He injures who cannot aid, when the trial comes on.’
 Do not imagine that I say it through any fear,
 Nor that I shall fail you in war as long as I am living.”

- When this counsel was given, the king did not heed it :
 The war will still take place, though Albany were lost ;
 410 But he wishes to send beyond the sea a spy
 To see the situation of the father in Normandy ;
 And then afterwards to Flanders, to the son, in whom he trusts,
 His letters and messages, to tell him loudly :

² Waltheof, earl of Dunbar, died in 1182. Chronicle of Melrose, ad an.

“ How the king his father by word opposes me
 And by such a menace as you have heard ;
 And if he will keep covenant by pledged faith,
 I will not fail to give him aid speedily.
 So let him send us from Flanders his Flemings with a navy,
 By hundreds and by fifties of those bold people :

420 I will give them the road to the people who war against us.
 They will attack the castles by regular siege.

“ William de Saint-Michel will deliver this message,
 And Robert de Husevile ; for both are wise :
 They have often given proof of ability in need,
 They well know in rich court to speak many a language.”

To do this message depart these messengers ;
 The king desires it and it is his pleasure, so they do it most willingly.
 At Berwick-on-Tyne¹ they find the boatmen,
 Who will take to Flanders the wise messengers.

430 Already they have entered barges, and go on the high sea,
 And hoist up their sails, and cause the anchor to be weighed ;
 They do not care to coast along England :
 They are their mortal enemies, whom they used to love.

When these knights have found their lord
 With the king of France, Lewis the emperor,
 They deliver their messages gently and without anger,
 So that the counts of France hear it well ;
 And count Philip is put in such emotion,
 The noble warrior speaks before the others.

440 Now speaks count Philip a sensible speech,
 Before the court of France ; it was very well heard :
 “ Keep to the king of Scotland the pledged faith ;
 That he may aid you in war, hastily, without delay ;
 Destroy your enemies and waste their country,
 That by fire and conflagration all may be kindled ;
 That he may leave them nothing without, either in forest or in meadow,
 Of which they may in the morning have a dinner ;
 Then let him besiege their castles with his assembled people :
 They shall have no succour nor aid within thirteen leagues.

450 “ Thus war should be begun, such is my opinion :
 First to destroy the land and then one’s enemy.
 We will help him from Flanders ere fifteen days come,
 By which those of England will be disabled.”

As soon as count Philip finished his attack,
 King Lewis of France wills it and agrees to it ;
 And says to our messengers : “ Soon shall be sealed
 The charter that you will take to your country.
 Tell the king of Scotland, without any delay,
 The land is all his own which he has demanded.”

460 When these messengers had come and reached the land,
 Then were they quite certain of beginning the war.
 Enough you might hear without going far :
 “ Let us go to take the castle of Wark in England.”

Never was born a man so memorable,
 Neither Solomon the wise, nor David who wrote the history,
 Who did not glory in having such a great victory
 As these promised him ; but all was vain glory.

Now has the king of Scotland his host prepared
 At Caldenle,¹ there they were assembled.

470 The trumpets were what then were loved,
 Which afterwards drove them from the land by force.

From Ross and from Moray they have a great host gathered.
 Certainly, earl Colbein² did not forget himself there.
 Lords, the earl of Angus³ came there with such aid,
 More than three thousand Scots he had in his command.
 There were so many naked people, I know not what more to tell you,
 There came not such a host from Scotland since the time of Elias.

Then came king William to Wark in England,
 A castle in the marches which afterwards made him great war,
 480 Labour and trouble, and often great opposition ;
 He inquired from the constable what he meant to do,
 Either to hold or give up, which he thought proper.

Roger d'Estuteville⁴ was its constable,
 Who never liked treason nor to serve the devil ;
 And saw that his power was of no avail

Against the host of Scotland, which besieges them strongly,
 Neither to surrender his castle he should have any terms :
 It was no marvel if lord Roger were dismayed.

Then he prays to God the glorious and his mother true :
 490 " Such counsel give me that I may preserve my honour,
 For the Scots war against me without any respite."

Roger d'Estuteville speaks to his intimate friends,
 And says : " Barons, knights, say what you recommend.
 See the host of the king of Scotland who has defied us ;
 And we shall be scorned within these holds,
 We shall have no succour nor help from any of our neighbours."

Then he invokes his lord, Henry the valiant king ;
 The tears along his face go falling down :
 " Evil was your strength, since now you are powerless !
 500 You cannot aid your baron in any way whatever.

I will go to the king of Scotland, asking for a truce,
 Forty days space, that I may pass the sea.

If then I cannot succour myself afterwards by right,
 You have lost without fail all Northumberland."

Roger d'Estuteville came to speak to the king,
 Wise with humility, [and] without doing anything wrong ;
 All those of his suite kept themselves in ranks,

¹ In MS. Lincoln, Kaledene de gré, which is apparently an error. There is a place in Selkirkshire called Caldenlea, where the Calden falls into the Tweed, and this is most probably the place meant.

² Probably Colban, earl of Fife.

³ Gilibrede, second earl of Angus. Dougl. Peerage of Scotland, i. 62.

⁴ Not mentioned in Dugdale's Baronage; but his name occurs as sheriff of Northumberland from 1170 to 1185 inclusive, in the Pipe Roll for that county, printed by Hodgson.

And says in his address : " Sire, listen to me.

" Do not do me shame, refrain your ire.

510 Much do I love your welfare, but let not mine suffer.

Forty days space, that I may pass the sea, [give me,] sire,

That I may send beyond sea my letters under wax ;

Or I myself will go there, whichever I please to choose,

And will say to my lord it would be wrong to sing or laugh :

If Jesus does not take care of the people of his empire,

He will not see them, for they will be all delivered to martyrdom."

Then saw king William Roger in great sorrow,

All Northumberland harassed with woe ;

There is none to oppose him or his vigour :

520 Willingly did he grant the space till the fortieth day.

Now says Jordan Fantome¹ that God protected them :

All those of Northumberland who were there,

Were it not for this truce which Roger asked,

Would have been driven from the land by those of Albany ;

But the wise knight who loved his lord

Prepares his messengers, he accoutred himself,

Went to England, asked for help,

So that within his term such a host he brought

That then to the king of Scotland full leave he gave 530 To attack him with his Flemings, and he will wait for them.

Then says king William : " Hear, my knights.

Throughout Northumberland I will take my way :

There is no one to oppose us, whom should we then fear ?

The bishop of Durham² (behold his messenger)

Informs me by his letters he wishes to remain at peace :

Neither from him nor his forces shall we have disturbance,

Of which I can complain to the value of a penny.

Let us go to Alnwick, if you will allow me,

To William de Vesci³ whom I cannot overcome.

540 If he will give up his father's castle to me,

I will then let him go without loss of limb ;

Or if he will make with me the same agreement

Which the constable of Wark made the day before yesterday,

Without collecting ammunition and without fortifying anything.

Let us go to Warkworth, that I will destroy."

Then the great host of Albany went to Alnwick ;

But William de Vesci did not forget himself there,

Often calls with love the aid of the Holy Father,

He invokes his lord more than a knight his mistress,

550 And says : " Barons, knights," to those of his bailiwick,

" Wisdom and folly are often good at need :

Now come each of you, tell us your opinion about this,

How we shall manage against the host which defies us."

Much was the father joyous in his heart

To have begotten a good son, though it was in concubinage :

² Hugh de Pudsey.

³ William de Vesci was lord of the castles of Alnwick and Warkworth, both in Northumberland. See Dugd. Baron. i. 92.

Of young William I say it in my language,
 Who his father's castle held by vassalage.
 The king departed then, made no longer stay there ;
 And the former sent for succour his letters and his messenger.

60 Knights and serjeants and the other pillagers
 Take and destroy the land next the sea.
 They come to Warkworth, do not deign to stop there ;
 For weak was the castle, the wall and the trench.
 And Roger ¹ the son of Richard, a valiant knight,
 Had had it in ward ; but he could not guard it.

Of this Roger the son of Richard I must certainly tell you :
 Of Newcastle-on-Tyne was he master and lord ;
 He was seized with such boldness and great ire
 That he would neither speak of peace to the king of Scotland nor laugh.

570 Thither came the king of Scotland with armed people and naked ;
 The hills and the valleys dread his coming.
 A greater folly than his never was seen,
 To the barons of the land it will be very dearly sold :
 He will give them, before his departure, such a discomfiture
 He will not leave them outside the castle an ox to their plough.

But the barons are devoted to their lord,
 They care as little for their property as does a wild beast ;
 They prefer dying with honour rather than suffer shame
 [And] abandon their natural lord, though they lose their lands.
 580 They will endure and wait : they do so wisely ;
 But they will not surrender their castles though they suffered great damage.

Well sees the king of Scotland that he will never succeed
 In conquering Newcastle-on-Tyne without stratagem ;
 And say his counsellors : “ Wrongly do you hang your head.
 [Before succour comes to them, they all will be in despair ;] ²
 But warn the host to be ready in the morning ;
 Go conquer Carlisle, of which we spoke.
 [Robert de Vaus ³ will never have such a good sable,
 Nor eat meat, nor drink such wine,

590 When he sees so many fine shields, so many Poitevin helmets.
 But he will wish to be a bishop on the chess-board.”]

Thus said king William : “ Then may I be cursed,
 Excommunicated by priest, shamed and discomfited,
 If to the castle of Odinel ⁴ I give any terms or respite !
 But I will entirely put an end to his joy and his delight.
 Earl Henry ⁵ my father loved and reared him ;
 But at length he will say that it was a misfortune to see me,

¹ This baron is often mentioned in the Pipe Rolls, 14 Hen. II. Concerning him, see Hodgson's Magnus Rotulus Pipæ, pp. xii. xiv.

² This line is wanting in the Lincoln MS., as are also lines 588—591.

³ See concerning him, Dugd. Baron. i. 525.

⁴ Odinel de Umfraville's castle was that of Prudhoe in Northumberland. Dugd. Baron. i. 504.

⁵ Henry, the father of king William, was the son of David I., king of Scotland.

For he in whom he trusts will be of a very little use to him.
[He makes him a refusal of his assistance."]¹

600 There the king of Scotland made his earls, his barons,
Pitch his pavilions, his tents and his marquees ;
And said to his baronage : " Lords, what shall we do there ?
As long as Prudhoe stands, we will never have peace."
Thus say the Flemings : " We will destroy it,
Or wrongly you will give us pay and provisions."
And said the other party : " Never will we speak of it,
We will never consent to his making any enterprise ;
But let him go forward to conquer, and we will help him.
Northumberland is ours, when we come back."

610 — " Sire, king of Scotland," say his counsellors,
" Of all your rights Carlisle is the most difficult [to secure] ;
And since the young king is willing to give you all,
Go and conquer the capital, we advise you thus ;
And if Robert de Vaus will not give the chief town,
From the old high tower you must have him thrown.
Lay siege to it, and then make your great assembled host
To swear not to stir from it
Till you have seen the city on fire,
The master-wall pulled down with your pickaxes of steel,

620 Himself fastened to a high gallows.
Then you will see Robert de Vaus slinking away ;
As far as I know, you will not find him so bold
That he will be able to resist you long by force."
And said king William : " If God will aid us,
This counsel is advisable, so let us execute it."
In the night he makes his watchmen watch his host,
Till the following morning at dawn when the day appeared clear,
When he made his trumpets sound to put the host in motion ;
And the serjeants and esquires take down the tents.

630 King William goes with his great baronage ;
But before they return to their wild country,
They will have made such damage among the English of England
That a thousand will leave their heads there for their own hostage,
For they are fierce in war and of very rash courage :
This is quite evident to those whom they find in their way.
Those who are caught in plain or in wood
Will never tell stories to any of their lineage.

Well knew the king of Scotland to make war upon his enemies,
And often in war to grieve and injure [them] ;
640 But he was too much accustomed to listen to new advice.
He cherished, loved and held foreigners dear ;
His own people he would never love,
Who should of right advise him and his kingdom
This appeared soon, presently you shall hear me speak of it,
What happened of his war through evil counsellors.
The king makes his people get ready ;
To those within he will give a complete assault.

- Great was the noise at the beginning of the fight,
 The swords clash, and the steel crashes,
 650 [Scarcely a hauberk or helmet remained whole.]¹
 That day those within were knights,
 With their swords they make many a shield shattered,
 They leave many of them stretched near the wall
 Who had no leisure to get up again.
 Henceforth those within must help [themselves],
 Endure the battle and damage the shields,
 Hold and contend for their barbican :
 No coward could be useful to them.
 At the gate there was a great attack,
 660 On both sides great was the fury.
 Then you might see so many bleeding knights,
 So many good vassals in bad humour ;
 The swords clash and intermingle.
 Robert de Vaus defended himself bravely ;
 The son of Odard² was not at all behindhand,
 For his lord he behaved himself most daringly
 In standing against so many people :
 Forty thousand, if Fantosme³ does not lie.
 There is none who does not hate him mortally.
 670 Oh ! God ! what sorrow for gentle king William !
 From king Henry he will have such mortal blame ;
 This grieves me, by the illustrious saint James !
 For a nobler man never governed a realm.
 Fantosme says and assures to us well
 That he would not think any day of his life
 To fight Henry of Normandy,
 The son of Matilda who has the hardy countenance ;
 But by counsel and by evil envy
 One may make a wise man commit a great folly.
 680 But since he had undertaken the thing thus,
 He could not leave it so through great cowardice.
 He orders peace to be kept towards the holy church,
 On those who infringe it he executes cruel justice ;
 But that is not worth to him a single clove of garlic :
 The rascally people, (whom may the Lord God curse !)
 The Welsh, who wish for booty,
 And the Scots, who are in Albany,
 Have no faith in God the Son of Mary ;
 They break open the churches and commit great robberies.
 690 The barons put themselves to great trouble
 Who held their estates from the sovereign king ;
 For their lord they have great sorrow certainly :
 His enemies have given them a present.
 If God and Mary Magdalen do not think of it,
 Great war they will have which will be very severe to them.

² John Fitz-Odard is mentioned in the Northumberland Pipe Roll, 14 Hen. II.

³ "Fantome" MS. Lincoln.

The land which was so full of such prosperity
 Is now spoiled and destitute of all riches ;
 There is no drink but spring water
 Where they used to have beer in the week.

- 700 And all is done by the king of Albany,
 By his counsel and by his great folly ;
 But now there arises to him great loss infallibly,
 He will not depart without having shame.
 Those of the castle will have speedy aid :
 So fares it with people who in the Lord God trust.

Hear, lords, what happens from too great daring,
 What happened to them from savage Scotland.

- Fine was the weather without any bad storm ;
 The king of Scotland was of bold courage,
 710 Good knight and of great valour.
 Before him came wandering a messenger,
 A canon was he, and knew the language ;
 Hastily he related to him his complaint.
 The king was in his pavilion ;
 The warders near and around,
 His chamberlains and his private friends,
 There where the messenger delivered to them such a speech
 By which they were afterwards excited to contention.
 The messenger told them the whole,

- 720 How he had seen the armed people,
 The great pride of the chevaliers
 Who would assault him before sunrise.
 " He of Lucy, the wise, the sensible,
 Before midnight will be joined with our men.
 Take care thereof, for God of majesty,
 That you are not disgraced nor shamed.
 All the best of your relations
 Come with him, every one has sworn to him.
 Trust to advice, the best is given to you.

- 730 To Roxburgh go in safety.
 If you delay any longer,
 A bad song will be sung of you.
 Never did Thibault de Balesgué¹ give

¹ "The romance, to which Fantosme alludes here, was well known in England. In a certificate or memoir concerning some books found, in the third year of Edward I.'s reign, we find this mention of it: 'Le Roman de Willeame de Orenge et Tabaud de Arable.' Formulare Anglicanum, p. 12, No. xxiii. A copy of it was bequeathed by Guy Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, to the abbey of Bordesley in Worcestershire, May 1st, 34 Edward I. or III. See our Tristan, vol. i. p. cxxi. l. 2.

"Fantosme's allusion, and the following lines taken from a poem of the twelfth century, show its antiquity:

Mais une merveille veoit
 Qui poist faire grant paor
 Au plus hardi combateor
 De toz ices que nos savons,
 Se fust Thiebautz li Esclavons
 Ou Opinax ou Fernaguz, etc.

(Le Roman d'Erec et d'Enide, MS. of the Royal Library, No. 7498⁴, Cangé, 26, fol. 41 verso, col. 2. l. 26.)—Michel's Note.

So bad a check to the natives of France
 As those hardened ones of the south will give you,
 If you and they encounter each other.”
 The king hears him, and is very angry,
 Without delay swore by saint Andrew :
 “ We stop here quite secure ;

740 Battle will not be refused them.

A brave man ought certainly to conquer his inheritance.
 My ancestors of the kingdom of Scotland
 Held that estate in quietness.

By this Lord whom they implore on foot !
 And I will hold it from the king to whom I am pledged,
 The son of the father who has given me my rights ;
 As long as I live I will not lose a single foot of it.”
 He would have already well addressed his host,
 When a counsel is given him by his men :

750 As he wished to be still honoured,

He should leave the siege and depart of his own free will.
 So he did indeed, nor stayed longer there,
 By none of his men were the reins drawn.
 To Roxburgh, where they were before,
 He went by night like one who was in haste ;
 Not a single one of his host lagged behind,
 Who did not go away through very great cowardice,
 Without any attack having been made upon them
 Or being shouted at or damaged in any thing.

760 Robert de Vaus gained in this chase,

He earned great wealth from these fugitives ;
 But, whoever is sorry for it or bears any ill will to him,
 He will strengthen his place with their property.
 Bends his foot and extends his talons,
 Thanks God and prays that He will not hate him.

Now the great host of England rides secure.
 Sir Richard de Lucy, no better needs be sought for,
 Well assists his lord to maintain his war,
 And he knows at need to ask for truces and peace

770 Where he sees force and it is necessary to ask for them.

He rides in the land destroyed and wasted :
 That is Northumberland which was already renowned.
 From here to the passes of Spain there was not such a country
 Nor more fruitful, nor people more honoured ;
 Now it is in great famine, it has become annihilated,
 If by the king of England aid is not given.
 He sighs and thinks how it is decayed,
 And curses the war for having already begun ;
 Then he thinks in his heart, if the Lord God pleases,

780 By him and his forces it will be soon avenged,

And by the good men who are of the country,
 Who desire greatly to revenge their sufferings.

Sir Humphrey de Bohun¹ was of very great cleverness,

As soon as he can spur he goes from the chief-justice :
It is lord Richard de Lucy whom every body prizes.
He did not wish to provoke the king of Scotland in any way,
For a messenger of his tells him news :

He had come to the land, who will lay siege to them.

The earl of Leicester has thus undertaken the thing

- 790 With Flemings and with French and with people towards Friseland,
He will turn England wholly at his command.

“ God ! ” quoth Richard de Lucy, “ what great distress I am in !
If the king of Scotland knew what is doing,
We should have neither peace nor truce for all the wealth of France ;
And he ought not to do it, unless he were a great child . ”

He rides and spurs, and has in his heart heaviness ;
But before he could succeed to speak in the hearing
Of the king of Albany or do his business

Had lord Humphrey de Bohun who boldly advances

- 800 Caused to the king of Scotland the loss of Berwick.

Lord Humphrey de Bohun was of very great consequence ;

The barons of Northumberland are his companions in it ;

They burnt all Berwick with fire and firebrands

And a great part of the surrounding country,

For they appear in their marches cruel as lions ;

But lord Richard de Lucy does not care for such speech.

And says in his language : “ Sir Humphrey de Bohun,
[The barons of Northumberland are his companions in it] ¹

Ah ! if God does not take care, we shall certainly lose.

- 810 “ Sir Humphrey de Bohun, ” quoth Richard de Lucy,

[Who did not go away through very great cowardice,

Without any attack having been made upon them

Or being shouted at or damaged in any thing.

Robert de Vaus gained in this chase] ²

“ Let us go to the king of Scotland to cry him mercy

To hold peace and truce to our king Henry.

The most of England have all failed him.

Know you the news that we have heard ?

The earl of Leicester has ill-treated us all ;

- 820 He has arrived in North Wales, ³ you may be certain of it,

And has taxed the land as if he was sheriff of it,

As far as Dunwich by force he got it . ”

Now is Humphrey de Bohun angry in his heart :

“ Sir Richard de Lucy, your age will now appear ;

And if you are now, as they say, so wise,

Go in haste to the king of Scotland, conceal from him this damage.

If he knows this news he will be of a very fierce courage.

That the earl has arrived and succeeded in passing,

He will not give you his truce, unless he has madness in his body ;

² Another careless repetition of the lines 757—760. This mistake is not found in the Lincoln MS.

³ Arwelle, MS. Lincoln, obviously the correct reading, as Orwell harbour in Sussex is the point indicated. See further, line 841.

- 830 I will go back, it will be for his damage.
 If God is willing and agrees, I will efface the outrage.
 Wrongly they had arrived from Flanders the wild.”
 Now has Richard de Lucy done as a sensible [man],
 He has from the king of Scotland all he had asked
 Of truces for Northumberland till about summer ;
 And lord Humphrey de Bohun is gone back
 And many a gentle knight in England born ;
 They will be in a short time with Flemings acquainted.
 You have heard it well, the little and the great,
- 840 That earl Robert is gone so far forward
 That he has arrived in Suffolk,¹ [and] goes taxing the land ;
 As far as Dunwich all moves by his command,
 Many a gentleman of Flanders goes this day following him :
 Whereat the king of England had afterwards a great joy.
 Earl Hugh Bigod² has taken his messengers,
 And announces to those of Dunwich that he is their friend,
 That they should take part with the earl, and they should have play and amusement,
 Or that they would lose their heads who are still living ;
 And those have answered him that wrongly counsel would be taken about it,
- 850 On the contrary they will sell themselves very dear to their enemies.
 Surely you have heard it in proverb :
 “ He who commits treason to his lawful lord
 Or any felony by which he suffer injury,
 To have bad recompense must not doubt ;
 And he who loyally serves him is much to be esteemed.”
 So did the people of Dunwich, of whom you hear me speak.
 The earl of Leicester wished to besiege them,
 And swore his oath as he was accustomed,
 If the burghers and the peers did not surrender themselves to him,
- 860 There should not escape a man without death or injury ;
 And these answer him with emulation :
 “ Confounded be he who dreads you to the amount of a penny !
 Still living is the good lawful king,
 Who will very soon bring your war to an end.
 As long as we can live and stand on our feet,
 We will not surrender the town from fear of any assault.”
 The earl of Leicester began to be angry,
 And erects the gallows to frighten them ;
 Then causes to arm in haste serjeants and esquires,
- 870 To assault the town vigorously he resolved to do what he could.
 That day you might have seen burghers, very valiant knights,
 Sally out to their fortifications ; each knows his business,
 Some to shoot with bows, others to cast darts ;
 The strong help the feeble often to repose.
 There was within the town neither maid or woman

² Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk. Dugd. Baron. i. 132.

Who did not carry a stone to the palisade to cast.

So did the people of Dunwich defend themselves,
As these verses speak which are here written ;
And so brave were the great and the little 880 That earl Robert went away quite scorned.

The earl of Leicester is of very great valour,
Towards the people of Dunwich he found no love ;
Neither assault nor vassal could be of any use to him,
Nor serjeant nor esquire, whom those might fear.
He and the earl set about returning,
Till the morrow at dawn, when he saw the day appear.

He called his constables, and said to them in hearing :

“ Cause your men to mount, delay will be wrong.

I will go to Norwich, if God gives me power,

890 To see their business, what is their countenance.”

And those do not delay to do the deed ;

Soon might you see in haste displayed many a sleeve,

Many a pennon of silk borne on fine lance, ~~and~~

And many a good gentle vassal, many a man of great valour.

If any wish to hear the truth how Norwich was taken,
I was not in the country when it was besieged :

A Lorrain traitor betrayed it, therefore it was surprised.

None can guard himself against treason in any guise,

Except only king Henry, who punishes the cruel

900 By the power of the Creator and the prayer of holy church ;

He never made pretence to keep peace according to his power,

And may God, who never lied, preserve him in his service !

Jordan Fantosme first wanted to give himself up,

On all the reliques an oath to swear,

There is no clerk in all the world, ever so clever in recording

His lesson in his book, or in speaking of any art,

Who could tell me or can mention

A land which from hence to Montpellier

Is worth that of Norfolk, of which you hear me speak,

910 More honoured knights or more hospitable,

Or merrier dames to give largely,

Except the town of London, of which nobody knows its peer ;

To the barons of the town none could be compared.

Never in this war you heard speak of any,

Let him be ever so rich in land, who dared besiege them,

Or point towards them the finger even in thought,

Who had not a sore recompense in lieu of his pay.

Gentle king of England, just imagine

How you ought to love London and the barons ;

920 For never did they fail their lawful lord,

But were always the first at his need.

They had enough of messengers from Flanders beyond the sea,

Who promised to give them great honours.

Your own son, whom you should love much,

Since by nature he has begun to be reconciled,

Asked them by letters and by his messengers

To help him to war against his father,
 On such condition as you will hear me name,
 That all the days of his life he would hold them so dear,
 930 Would love and cherish, and much would give them ;
 But they would not do it nor even consent to it
 To chase or exile you from your kingdom.
 Therefore you ought to love, honour and cherish them,
 And at their great need their loyalty recompense,
 Since for any promise they would never swerve ;
 But to love you as they could was their pleasure.
 Gentle king of England, do my desire ;
 Love those who wish to serve you in loyalty.
 There should not to the young king come any harm
 940 (Since by natural affection he has begun to repent)
 From bringing foreign people to injure his own
 Who after the days of his father are to support him.
 Before this century comes to an end,
 Many adventures may happen.
 Never had you such a war to sustain,
 But your son had a greater ; now let him think of nourishing his people.

The earl of Leicester does not cease to waste
 The land of Norfolk, of which you hear me speak ;
 He could not in Normandy injure king Henry :
 950 Therefore he wanted to embroil England as much as he could.
 He has with him Flemings by hundreds and by thousands.
 Earl Hugh the Bigod wished to aid him altogether ;
 And the earl of Ferrieres,¹ a simple knight
 (He had better kiss and embrace a fair lady
 Than with a hammer of war strike a knight),
 Informs him by his letters he may go secure
 Throughout all England, he will have no disturbance there.
 The earl tells him those who wish to war :
 It is the king of Scotland whom he first named,
 960 And lord David his brother who is much to be prized,
 And lord Roger of Mowbray² who was always a warrior.
 " He will come to succour you where you want it.
 All the land is on fire : think of moving.
 The old king of England will have need of his people ;
 He is in great difficulty, so we must praise God :
 Never in his life will he pass the sea,
 But will have lost Normandy by passing.
 If you could ride to Leicester,
 Before Easter came you might go
 970 As far as the Tower of London, there would be no disturbance.
 The good city of York is lord Roger's,
 Throughout all Yorkshire he proclaims himself lord.
 There are within my country scarcely any knights, Whom I will not kill outright, if I have not their aid."
 —" Oh ! God !" thus said the earl, " how enraged I could be now !

² Id. i. 122.

I have been too long waiting to help my lord
 And to revenge myself on the old king his father and for my injuries.
 Shall I hear, lords knights, any one of you speak?
 To do this business who will dare advise me?"

980 —“ Yes, sir,” quite boldly answered him his wife.

“ Lord God forbid, who is lawful king,
 That you for Humphrey de Bohun should give up this journey,
 Either for the earl of Arundel¹ or for his fair speech!
 The English are great boasters, they do not know how to fight;
 Better they know with large cups to drink and act the glutton.
 The earl of Gloucester² is much to be feared;
 But he has your sister for wife and companion:
 For all the wealth of France he would not begin
 To commit any outrage from which you would have disturbance.”

990 —“ Dame,” so said the earl, “ now I hear you speak;

Your counsel I must follow, for much I love you.

—Sir Hugh del Chastel,³ will you grant it?

If you were at Leicester in danger,

Of all the men of England you need not be afraid;

But might often cause them great trouble.”

And said Hugh del Chastel: “ There is nothing to do but go.”

Soon you might hear shouting very loud

Between Flemings from Flanders and French and Pohier:⁴

“ We have not come to this country to dwell,

1000 But to destroy king Henry the old warrior,

And to have his wool, which we desire.”

Lords, that is the truth: the most were weavers,

They did not know how to bear arms like knights.

But for this they had come, to have gain and war;

For there is no place on earth more hospitable than Saint-Edmund's.

Now listen, lords barons, to God's great vengeance,

Which he poured down on Flemings and on the people of France.

The earl of Leicester was of great power;

But he was in heart too youthful and childish

1010 When through England he wished to go publicly,

Committing his robberies without having disturbance,

And makes his wife take arms, carry shield and lance.

His great folly will take hard birth.

Saint-Edmund's had knights of very great power,

It arms them in haste without any delay:

It was Walter Fitz-Robert, of whom you hear speak,

Who first encountered the Flemings and put them into a bad way.

Indeed, the earl of Arundel (he never loved delay)

Thither came with the train, whom saint Edmund prosper!

1020 Sir Humphrey de Bohun caused them annoyance;

Soon you will see them come to blows, there is no other separation.

² Id. i. 535.

³ This French nobleman is frequently mentioned by Hoveden, William of Newborough, and Benedictus Abbas.

⁴ See Du Cange, under the word “Poheri.” These were the inhabitants of a small principality called Poix.

The earl of Leicester stopped short,
 And saw the armed people who came approaching them :
 " Sir Hugh del Chastel, now here come forward,
 And all your company, the little and the great.

By my conscience ! we will not go farther,
 We will accept battle very hard and very heavy.
 Behold hauberks and helmets against the sun shining ;
 But now be knights, for God's sake I command you.

1030 Woe to the body of the man who first runs away,
 That it may never be said in a proverb that we are recreants."
 The earl of Arundel is of great pride,
 And says to Humphrey de Bohun : " Now let us go and attack them
 In honour of God and saint Edmund, who is a true martyr."
 Answers Roger le Bigod : " Quite at your pleasure !
 I never in my life had so great a desire for anything
 As to destroy the Flemings, whom I see coming here."

It was Walter Fitz-Robert who spurred on the first,
 Now may the omnipotent King be his aid !

1040 And goes to attack the Flemings very furiously ;
 And they resist him, who fear him not.
 They were more than he by thousands and by hundreds,
 So they force him back with his people ;
 But he did not delay to seek vengeance :
 Woe to them that they saw England, all will be sorry for it.
 He encountered the earl, and said to him harshly :
 " You are the man of my lord, be not slow ;
 See his enemies going to his destruction.
 Spur on, sir earl, along with us."

1050 And this he swore by God's lance, (that was his oath,)
 Woe to Robert that he brought from Flanders such people.
 Then you might see the earl who drew himself up proudly.
 And lord Roger le Bigod who undertakes great deeds.
 Nor did lord Hugh de Creissy¹ fail them at all ;
 But before they could fall upon them at their pleasure,
 Humphrey de Bohun had retained more than a hundred.

Certainly well does Robert Fitz-Bernard² perform,
 Of this foreign people he makes a wonderful clearance ;
 Neither can Flemings or Lombards assist themselves :

1060 The wool of England they gathered very late.
 Upon their bodies descend crows and buzzards,
 Who carry away the souls to the fire which ever burns.
 There the priest of Suart will say mass for them ;
 It would be better for them in Flanders to hang by a rope.

The Flemings would have been very brave, if God were their aid ;
 But they had not deserved it for their great robberies.
 The earl of Leicester saw their company to his misfortune,
 And lord Hugh del Chastel will not rejoice in it :
 They are in the midst of the crowd, feeble, without aid.

1070 My lady the countess has entered the way,

² Mentioned in Hoved. Annal. A. D. 1172, fol. 302, b.

And met with a ditch where she was almost drowned,
 In the midst of the mud her rings she forgets ;
 Never will they be found in all her life.

The wife of the earl wished to drown herself intentionally,
 When Simon de Vahull ¹ set about lifting her up :
 “ Lady, come away with me, give up that idea ;
 Thus it fares in war, to lose or to gain.”

1080 Then began earl Robert to be strongly affected
 When he saw his wife taken, he had good reason to be angry,
 And saw his companions slain by hundreds and by thousands :
 The colour began to change in his face.

Lord Humphrey de Bohun and the earl of Arundel
 Have detained the earl and Hugh del Chastel,
 And lord Roger le Bigod was this day newly arrived ;
 To him and to Hugh de Creissy this deed seemed very fine.
 There was in the country neither villager nor clown
 Who did not go to destroy the Flemings with fork and flail.
 With nothing meddled the armed knights
 But only with knocking them down, and the villagers with killing them ;
 1090 By fiftens, by forties, by hundreds and by thousands
 By main force they make them tumble into the ditches.
 If God did a miracle there, it is not to be wondered at ;
 For never in my life I heard speak of any man,
 However bold he might be in arms, however valiant a knight,
 If he wanted to war against king Henry,
 And even those of England desired to aid him,
 Who did not end by getting the worst of it.

After earl Robert was taken and defeated,
 All England was somewhat more secure.
 1100 All the Flemings of Flanders met with hard luck,
 None of the king's enemies feels secure of anything.

Earl David of Scotland, whatever may be said of him,
 Was a most gentle warrior, so God bless me ;
 For never by him was robbed holy church or abbey,
 And none under his orders would have injured a priest.
 It was in May after April when the grass has grown green,
 That David came from Scotland with proud company,
 [Having] become his brother's man, in the presence of his baronage,
 On giving him all Lennox all the days of his life,
 1110 Besides the honour of Huntingdon ; he has pledged his faith for it :
 That and much more he will give him, provided he assist him
 To make war on king Henry, the duke of Normandy.

Now has David of Scotland to England come
 With hauberks and with helmets and with fine painted shields.
 Those of Leicester sent him greeting,
 And say how it has happened to their lord :
 Now let him come to defend them, and he will be well received ;
 By him and by his force will the castle be held.
 Certainly, to Bertram de Verdun ² it will be very dearly sold ;
 1120 If it fall into their hands, he will be very angry.

² Id. i. 471.

Now hear, lords, of the earl how he was taken :
 He had in Huntingdon left some of his friends,
 He was in Leicester exceedingly powerful ;
 To those of Nottingham it will be worse every day.

Those of Northampton were of great valour ;
 But lord David of Scotland put them to great difficulty :
 He could not have tribute from them for love,
 So he made a hostile expedition against the burghers one day.
 Certainly, whoever will listen, I will tell him the truth of it.

1130 Well did the earl and all his companions.

Exceedingly well did the knights who came from the castle.
 Lord Bertram de Verdun was there this day newly arrived,
 He had fine arms and a horse very fleet,
 From many who jousted he the prize carried off ;
 And lord David of Scotland did there his best,
 He carried off such a booty as seemed to him very fine.

David in England warred very well ;
 But the war turned out badly to the king of Scotland :
 By his evil counsellors he undertook to do such a thing
 1140 From which at the end came to him very great misfortune.

David was very wise, and was also amiable,
 And protected holy Church, for never did he wish to wrong
 A priest or canon who knew grammar,
 Nor nun of abbey would he displease on any account.

It was after Easter, I ought to remember well,
 That the king of Scotland began to return
 Towards Northumberland to waste and injure.
 Oh, God ! what great damage I saw befall them !
 When the king of Scotland came to attack Wark,

1150 On whatever side he wished to assault,
 Roger d'Estuteville had prepared himself there for it.
 Woe to Fantosme,¹ if you ever hear me lie !
 And if I lie to you, you may well hear this,
 How Roger laboured to serve his lord.

Hear of the king of Scotland how he warred,
 When he departed from Wark how he proposed :
 He prepared at night a great number of chevaliers,
 To the castle of Bamborough² immediately despatched them.
 I well knew the baron who conducted and led them ;
 1160 I will not speak of him, for much has he lost by it.

This assembled host will do wonderful damage.
 Now would to Jesus the son of holy Mary
 That the poor people had been then warned of it,
 Who in their beds are sleeping and know nothing of it !
 It was still morning when the dawn cleared up,
 When these chevaliers armed themselves, the fierce company ;
 The town of Belford³ was first attacked.

² The castle of Bamborough, situated on the sea-coast of Northumberland.

³ A small town in the north of the county last mentioned.

- Over all the country they scattered themselves :
 Some run to towns to commit their folly,
 1170 Some go to take sheep in their folds,
 Some go to burn the towns, I cannot tell you more ;
 Never will such great destruction be heard spoken of.
 Then might you see peasants and Flemings who tie them,
 And lead them in their cords like heathen people.
 Women fly to the minster, each was ravished
 Naked without clothes, she forgets there her property.
 Ah, God ! why did William de Vesci not know it,
 Roger d'Estuteville, the others also ?
 The booty would have been rescued, nor would they have failed in it ;
 1180 But they knew it not, certainly it grieves me.
 They burnt the country ; but God was a friend
 To those gentle peasants who were defenceless,
 For the Scots were not their mortal enemies :
 They would have beaten, slain and ill-treated them all.
 Very great was the booty which the royalists carry away,
 They came to Berwick on Tyne ¹ to their lodgings,
 They have joy enough for that and much amusement ;
 For they are rich in cattle, oxen and horses
 And in fine cows, sheep and lambs,
 1190 In clothes and money, in bracelets and rings.
 Then sent the king of Scotland for his knights,
 The earls of his land, all the best warriors ;
 To Wark he wished to lay siege by his good counsellors,
 He wished to have the castle by Flemings and archers,
 By good stone-bows, by his engines very strong
 And by his slingers and his cross-bow-men.
 Will you hear of Roger how he behaved himself ?
 He was not the least dismayed when this host came to him :
 He had in his train knights more than twenty,
 1200 Certainly, the best serjeants that ever baron retained.
 The host was marvellous, of great chivalry,
 Of Flemings and Border-men fierce was the company.
 Roger d'Estuteville has garrisoned his house,
 He does not fear their siege the value of a clove of garlick :
 He has a very gentle baronage to whom he trusts much,
 And to exhort them well he did not forget.
 By a Monday morning were equipped
 Those who shall assault the castle, Flemings they were named,
 Then you might see bucklers seized and shields buckled on,
 1210 The port-cullis assaulted, as you may soon hear.
 By wonderful daring they came to the ditches ;
 Those who were inside did not forget themselves ;
 They soon struck each other and were so mingled together
 That I never saw a better defence in these two kingdoms.
 The Flemings were daring and very courageous,
 And the other much enraged in their fortress.
 Soon you might see serjeants and Flemings so mingled,

- Shields and bucklers broken, pennons displayed,
 Flemings turning back from the port-cullises, wounded ;
 1220 Some were carried from the port-cullises by others ;
 Never will they cry Arras ! [until] dead they are and buried.
 Long lasted this assault ; but little succeeded :
 Certainly king William did not cease to lose.
 Roger d'Estuteville exhorted his men,
 By very gentle words he addressed and harangued them :
 " Gentle barons companions, by God who formed you !
 Do not speak basely, and we will not do so ;
 If they assault us, God will defend us.
 They do wrong to king Henry, for he has done no harm.
 1230 " Shoot not your arrows forth but on great occasions ;
 We know not their intentions and nothing of their thoughts.
 They have wide ways and roads and paths,
 Wine and beer, drink, food,
 And are rich in arms and in fleet steeds ;
 And we are here within, serjeants and soldiers :
 If we have victuals, let us keep them willingly.
 Spare your arms, I say that to you, archers ;
 But when you see need and great complete assaults,
 Then defend your heads like gentle chevaliers."
- 1240 Roger d'Estuteville exhorted thus the people,
 And the king of Scotland was greatly enraged.
 When he saw his serjeants die and often fail
 And saw that he was not gaining ground, he was grieved in heart ;
 And said to his chevaliers in his great irritation :
 " Make your stone-bow come hastily ;
 It will soon break the gate, if the engineer lies not ;
 And we shall take the outer fortification without any delay."
 Hear, lords, of the stone-bow how it went on :
 The first stone which it ever cast at them,
 1250 The stone was scarcely parted from the sling
 When it knocked one of their knights to the ground.
 Were it not for his armour and the shield which he had,
 To none of his lineage had he ever returned ;
 Much must he hate the engineer who contrived that for them,
 And the king of Scotland who lost more by it.
 Then said king William a marvellous joke :
 " Certainly this deed seems to me very costly
 Rage possesses my heart and wrath so hideous,
 I had rather be taken quite alive before Toulouse."
- 1260 It is no marvel if he has heaviness in his heart :
 Woe that he saw Flemings of Flanders and then the king of France ;
 He knows well the truth at last and without mistake :
 That he has lost king Henry without any remedy,
 And cannot injure him by buckler or lance
 Nor by engine of war, from which he may have much harm.
 When the stone-bow failed him, he ordered up the other :
 He fain would burn the castle, he knows not what to do better ;

- But Jesus the glorious, the Creator of all things,
 Turned against the king of Scotland the wind very contrary, 1270 And to Roger the baron it began much to please.
 Now he has such great gladness, in his life he never had more.
 Then said king William : " Let us raise this siege ;
 I see my people destroyed and the mischief which cuts us off.
 Certainly, this affair grieves me strongly at heart.
 Roger d'Estuteville has found us out."
- The king of Scotland made his host watch in the night,
 Until the following day at dawn when daylight appeared clear,
 When he assembled all his earls and barons :
 " Gentle barons, knights, now hear me speak :
 1280 Let us raise this siege, we can make nothing of it ;
 But we have great loss by it : think of restoring it.
 Kindle the fire, burn these huts,
 Collect and fold your tents and pavilions,
 And cause all my host to go Roxburgh."
 Then you might see these merchants coming and going,
 Unpitching the pavilions, and unfolding the tents,
 Through this host of Scotland making great noise :
 Of his great discomfiture he might well remember.
 King William departed, who wished to go.
- 1290 Now they set the huts on fire and burn them.
 Very great was the noise, that is not to be concealed from you,
 Which in this host servants and esquires make.
 Roger d'Estuteville was no coward,
 Nor fearful in war, nor a base knight ;
 Never of a wiser man did you hear speak,
 Nor of more steady nor of more gentle warrior.
 When he saw this assembled host going towards Roxburgh,
 To his gentle baronage he began to speak :
 " Say nothing wrong ; for God's sake ! let it be, 1300 Neither cry at nor hoot these people of Scotland ;
 But God our Father we must all praise :
 When he from the king of Scotland and from his host so wild
 Has preserved us our lives, we ought to thank Him.
 " To play or to amuse yourselves I forbid not ;
 And when you see the king and his assembled host depart,
 Then shout your joy each for himself ;
 I shall do the same, so that it shall be heard.
 The son injures the father, who opposes him so."
 Then might you hear the cornets sounding by ranks :
- 1310 There were no reproaches, nor taunting words said ;
 But songs and choruses and friendly salutations ;
 Of horns and trumpets very fine was the accord.
 Roger d'Estuteville is glad at heart,
 Well ought he to be so, do not wonder at it ;
 For the king of Scotland has left him his own :
 He has, thank God, neither lost nor won,
 And has none of his followers slain or injured,
 Knight or serjeant in the body wounded

For whom he should have to give a coined denier

1320 To a physician of Salerno to be treated for it.

Lords, in such disgraceful manner departed king William
From Wark, and for that siege he will still have blame.
He has such great wrath in his heart that he almost faints from it.
Then has sworn an oath, saint Andrew and saint James,
He will not give up the war though he were to lose his kingdom.

Behold Robert de Mowbray, who well knew war ;

To his two eldest sons had left his land,

His castles, his domains, and they knew what to do.

He came to the king of Scotland to beg and to request

1330 That he would fight quite securely, for that it was the truth

That there was not on earth any one who could oppose him.

Now has the king such joy, never in his life had he more ;

Never would he draw back from doing wrong.

In the night was the counsel taken how they should act :

To royal Carlisle in the morning they shall go,

No one disputes it ; but now they shall begin,

They will never cease to look for their injury.

Now is Roger de Mowbray with the king of Albany

To make war according to his power, with strength and in aid, 1340 So is lord Adam de Porz¹ with great chivalry ;

They were the best warriors known to be in existence.

They had been once so ; but they little know

That God will not long consent to their folly.

Away goes king William with his great gathered host

Towards Carlisle the fair, the strong garrisoned city.

Lord Roger de Mowbray and his chivalry

And lord Adam de Porz joins himself to his Border-men.

The earls of Scotland lead the hated people,

Who never had any repugnance to do fiendish things.

1350 They make such progress, I know not what more to tell you,

That they could see Carlisle full of beauty ;

The sun illuminates the walls and turrets.

He who has a merry banner, gladly displays it ;

And the trumpets sound in every rank :

You might hear noise in the shuddering city ;

But lord Robert de Vaus gently begs them

Not to be dismayed nor act cowardly ;

For, if God keeps his life safe and sound,

He fears not at all this host nor the king of Albany.

1360 The king summons Roger and Adam to council,

Walter de Berkeley,² who was one of his retainers :

“ Now behold, noble knights, much gentle preparation ;

You cannot count the white nor the red,

So many are the banners dancing in the sun !

“ Go to Robert, say that I send him this message :—

Surrender me the castle this very moment :

He will have no succour from any living man,

And the king of England will never more be his defender ;

² See Chalmers' Caledonia, i. 528.

- And if he will not do so, swear well to him
 1370 He shall lose his head for it and his children shall die.
 I will not leave him a single friend or relation Whom I will not exile, if he does not execute my command.”
 Now go the barons demanding the truce,
 They go to Robert de Vaus where he was ;
 He was dressed in a hauberk, leaning on a battlement,
 And held in his hand a keen sword
 With a sharp edge, he handled it gently ;
 And saw the messenger who called him,
 From him and his men asking the truce.
- 1380 And he answered him : “ Friend, what is it you want ?
 You might soon leave there the little and the great.”
 And said the messenger : “ That is not courteous :
 A messenger carrying his message should not be Insulted or ill-treated ; he may say what he likes.”
 And said Robert de Vaus : “ Now come nearer, Say your pleasure ; be afraid of nothing.”
- Lords, in such way as this did the messenger speak
 To Robert, who is the chief, and to all the baronage :
 “ Sir Robert de Vaus, you are valiant and wise.
- 1390 I am the king’s messenger, he is my protector ;
 He sends you by me salutation and friendship.
 Restore him the castle which is his inheritance :
 His ancestors had it already long in peacefulness ;
 But the king of England has disinherited him of it
 Wrongly and sinfully, thus he sends you a message by me.
 And, if you please, you know that this is the truth.
 You were not a child nor of childish age
 That you and all the kingdom did not see that.
 Now show him love before his baronage :
- 1400 Surrender him the castle and all the fortress,
 And he will give you so much coined money
 Never Hubert de Vaus¹ had so much collected.
 “ Surrender him the castle on such terms,
 And become his man on such conditions :
 He will give you so much property in fine gold and money,
 And much more than we tell you.
 “ If you do not consent to it to disinherit him,
 You must not in any place trust to his person :
 He will besiege the castle with his people,
- 1410 You will not go out of it any day without injury to you ;
 And if he can gain the castle by force,
 The king of England will be of no avail to you,
 Nor all the gold of his kingdom which he could collect,
 To prevent you from being drawn on a hurdle and adjudged to a bad death.”

When lord Robert heard this, he was very calm :

“ We do not care about quarrels or threats.

[We are here within good steady people :]²

² This line does not occur in the Lincoln MS.

May he be disgraced who will surrender himself as long as victuals last !

Tell me, messenger, may God give you honour !

1420 Go to the king of Scotland, who is your lord ;
Say that I inform him I take from him no estate
Nor fees nor inheritance, nor will I ever do so ;
But let him go to king Henry, let him make his complaint
That I hold the castle and tower of Carlisle
By force against him as a true warrior ;
And if my sire the king be angry with me for it,
Let him send me his messenger, but no traitor,
Who may tell me from him : ‘ Give up this honour
Willingly and cheerfully ; there must be no giving it back

1430 “ And if he will not do so, let us make a covenant :
Give me such a respite that I may pass the sea,
And I shall tell my lord, Henry the valiant king,
To give him back his honour as far as he is requiring,
The castle of Carlisle and all belonging to it.
Then he is sure of it, if I have the command for it,
Certainly ; or, if not, were I to die here before,
The castle of my lord I will not surrender to him.”

When the king’s messenger the answer had heard,
He said to his companions : “ I never saw such thing.

1440 If the king my lord have no pity on him,
I value little all the baronage he has collected here.”
And he said to Robert de Vaus : “ We will go hence ;
Woe to you that you saw Carlisle as well as king Henry.”
Then the messengers departed thence,
And tell their lord all they had heard :

“ Sire, king of Scotland, now hear the message.
Robert informs you through me that he fears you not ;
He will not surrender the castle for gold or for silver,
And for Scotland besides, if he had a present of it,

1450 And had rather die before all his people.
There is within the castle enough of wine and corn,
And there is unanimity between him and his people
I must say all that belongs to a messenger.
He does not wish to take from you any thing which is yours ;
But, if he saw his lord to whom the honour belongs,
And he ordered him to leave it by his command,
And only said to him with his own mouth,
‘ Surrender to king William,’ he would do it very readily ;
And he will inform him soon and quickly.”

1460 And said king William : “ This is a joke of his.”
The king had counsellors, he knew all their business ;
He did not this time any harm to Robert,
But went to Appleby :¹ there he directed his march.
There were no people in it : therefore he took it speedily.

The king had very soon the castle of Appleby ;
There were no people in it, but it was quite unguarded.

Gospatric¹ the son of Horm, an old grey-headed Englishman,
Was the constable; he soon cried mercy.

The king had then forgot his sorrow

- 1470 When he had the castle and the tower of Appleby;
And goes threatening much the king our lord,
Henry the son of Matilda, to whom God give honour!
To vanquish all those may He give him strength and vigour
Who are against him to deprive him of his possessions!

King William of Scotland has already taken Appleby,
And Roger de Mowbray who was his friend;
And they place within it their serjeants as warders of the marches,
And have appointed three constables in the castle;
They have great joy and laughter enough among themselves:

- 1480 They think never to lose them till the day of judgment.
They wish to go to Burc;² the resolution was soon taken.
If it is not surrendered to them, not a single living being shall go out of it;

But the castle was not so unprovided,
That there were not within it more than six knights.
The castle was very soon attacked on all sides;
And the Flemings and the Border-men make a violent assault upon them,

And have the first day taken from them the outer fortification,
And soon they left it and placed themselves in the tower.

Now are they in this tower, they will hold out a short time;

- 1490 For they set fire to it, they will burn them who are inside it.
[They do not know any plan nor what they can do;
Already the fire is lighted: now they will be burnt here.]³
“By my faith! fair sire, if you please, they will not do so;
But will behave like knights: they will stick to the king,
For they see very well they will have no succour.”
They cannot hold out longer, they have surrendered to the king.
That is well done which they do now.
They have surrendered to the king, they have great sorrow in their hearts.

But a new knight had come to them that day.

- 1500 Now hear of his deeds and his great exploits:
When his companions had all surrendered,
He remained in the tower and seized two shields,
He hung them on the battlements, he stayed there long,
And threw at the Scots three sharp javelins;
With each of the javelins he has struck a man dead.
When those failed him, he takes up sharp stakes
And hurled them at the Scots, and confused some of them,
And ever keeps shouting: “You shall all be soon vanquished.”
Never by a single vassal was strife better maintained.
- 1510 When the fire deprived him of the defence of the shields,
He is not to blame if he then surrendered.

² Brough under Stanemore, in Westmoreland.

³ These two lines are supplied from the Lincoln MS.

Now is Burc overthrown and the best of the tower.

[Now is Robert de Vaus in some alarm ;] ¹

He sends his messenger the same day
To Richard de Luci, who tells him the truth
That Appleby has been taken in the morning,
And the castle of Brough, which is not much worse.

" I have now from no part either aid or succour,
And I think well that the king will give me hard treatment."

1520 And Richard de Luci says : " Now let him do the best,
Let him beware of becoming a deceiver for any thing ;
But if he loves Henry his good lord,
For him must he endure trouble and grief.
I send him for my part greeting and love ;
And news of the king, before fifteen days elapse,
He will have in England, if it pleases God the Saviour."
When Robert heard that, the colour came to his face ;
He who before was dejected, now is in joy.

Of Richard de Luci now hear the truth :

1530 By the good sense which he has and his great loyalty,
His lord beyond the sea by his letters he has called ;
The Bishop of Winchester,² as it was arranged,
He himself went there through very great friendship,
And said to king Henry : " May God save you !
England salutes you as its defender,
Lord Richard de Luci and all the other baronage
Who adhere to you ; but hear the truth :
They are not ten, so may Lord God help me,
Who adhere to you in right loyalty."

1540 Then asks the king : " What then does Richard De Luci the loyal ? Is he on my side ?"
— " Yes, sire, indeed, he does not do things by halves ;
But would rather let himself be tied to a post with a rope."

— " And the earl of Arundel, how does he behave ?
Does he side with me ? does he war against us ?"

— " Sire, by my faith ! but he is your well-wisher
In all your need, in the foremost rank."

— " And Humphrey de Bohun, how has he behaved ?
Against my enemies has he fought ?"

1550 — " Sire, by my faith ! I wish to be believed in it :
He is one of the most loyal who has adhered to you."

— " Near York how behaved the barons ?
And those of Estuteville, do they keep their houses ?"

— " Certainly, sire, if you please, we know it very well,
From those of Estuteville no treasons have come."

— " And the elected bishop of Lincoln,³ how is he in the country ?
Can he not fight against his enemies ?"

— " He is, sire, truly your cordial friend ;
He has enough of chevaliers and good border-serjeants."

² This was Richard, surnamed Toelive, or of Ilchester.

³ Geoffrey, the natural son of Henry II. and Rosamond Clifford.

- “ Thomas the son of Bernard and his brother also, 1560 Are they very often with Richard de Luci ? ”
 — “ Certainly, sire, if you please, they are very friendly to you,
 And Roger le Bigod, who never failed.”
 — “ Now tell me the truth of my land of the north :
 Roger d’Estuteville, has he made any agreement ? ”
 — “ A thousand men would die there, sire, of bad death Ere Roger d’Estuteville injure you either right or wrong.”
 — “ Ralph de Glanville,¹ is he at Richmond,²
 And lord Robert de Vaus ? what are these two barons about ? ”
 1570 Then drew the messenger a profound sigh ;
 And the king said to him : “ Wherefore are these sighs ?
 Has then Robert de Vaus committed treason ?
 Has he surrendered Carlisle ? say nothing but truth.”
 — “ But he keeps it nobly like a gentle baron.
 Of his great trouble it is right we should tell you.
 The king of Scotland came the other day by Carlisle prancing
 And harshly threatening lord Robert de Vaus ;
 He asked him for the castle, with this covenant,
 That he would give him enough wherewith he should be rich ;
 1580 And if he did not do so thenceforth,
 He would make them all die of starvation, the little and the great.”
 — “ By my faith,” so said the king, “ here is a good covenant.
 In little time God works, so says the beggar.
 What then did the Scot do ? did he besiege Carlisle ? ”
 — “ By no means, sire, if you please, but he did a more daring thing ;
 For he has taken Appleby, for which I very much lament,
 And the castle of Brough, I must well acquaint you.”
 — “ How, my good fellow ! ” said the king, “ is then Appleby taken ? ”
 — “ Yes, sire, indeed, and all the country :
 1590 That has greatly encouraged your mortal enemies.
 Some held by you, who have joined them.
 Sire, for Robert de Vaus I have been here sent :
 Neither wine nor wheat can reach him any longer,
 Nor from the side of Richmond will he be assisted more ;
 If he has not speedy succour, all will be starved.
 Then will Northumberland be completely devastated,
 Odinel de Humfranvile at length disinherited ;
 Newcastle-on-Tyne will be destroyed,
 William de Vesci, his lands and his fees :
 1600 The Scots overrun it all like heathen.”
 — “ By God ! ” so said the king, “ it would be a great pity.”
 Then his eyes shed tears, he sighed deeply :
 — “ Eh, my good fellow ! what does the bishop of Durham ? ”
 — “ He is all one with king William.”
 — “ Saint Thomas,” said the king, “ preserve me my kingdom ;
 I confess myself guilty to you for what others have the blame.
 — Fair sir,” said the king, “ tell me truth,
 How do my barons of London my city ? ”

¹ A memoir of this celebrated baron of the Exchequer may be seen in Dugd. Baron. i. 423.

² A market town in Yorkshire.

- “ So may the Lord God help me who remains in Trinity, 1610 They are the most loyal people of all your kingdom.
 There is none in the town who is of such an age
 As to bear arms, who is not very well armed ;
 You would be wrong to think now anything bad of them.
 But, sire, now be acquainted with one thing :
 Gilbert of Munfichet¹ has fortified his castle,
 And says that the men of Clare are allied to him.”
 — “ O God !” so said the king, “ now take pity on it, Preserve my barons of London my city.
 — “ Go, lord bishop, into your country.
 1620 If God give me health and I may be living,
 You will have me at London before fifteen days come,
 And I will take vengeance on all my enemies.”
 He sends for his people, his good worthy serjeants
 And earls and barons,—there is not one left out ;
 He entrusted Rouen to them, for they are his friends.
 The bishop comes back, as I told you just now ;
 And Richard de Luci, who never was at a loss,
 Has gladly asked news of the king :
 “ Sir,” says the bishop, “ he is a worthy king :
 1630 He fears not the Flemings the value of a clove of garlick ;
 Nor does he, by my faith ! the king of Saint-Denis.
 He thinks he shall conquer his enemies so
 That you will² see him arrive in fifteen days from this.”
 Now is Richard de Luci in a great joy ;
 He informs Robert de Vaus he would be wrong to be afraid :
 He will have succour from the good king his lord
 Like loyal knight who has kept his honour.
 When Robert heard that above there in that tower,
 He never was more delighted at any time.
 1640 The king of Scotland came there in the very same day,
 And asked for Carlisle, city and tower ;
 Or he will have it by force, there will be no retraction.
 And Robert de Vaus said : “ For God the Creator !
 Appoint me a term, and name me a day :
 If succour does not come to me from the king my lord,
 I will surrender you the castle, and you shall be the commander !”
 And king William said : “ I have no fear of it ;
 You will have no succour, I know well the truth of it.”
 Now goes king William straight to Odelin,
 1650 He wanted to surprise him to get the castle ;
 But the castle was well provided afresh :
 Now Odelin will be besieged within there,
 For the king of Scotland sends him a challenge.
 Odelin had good people established in the castle :
 So he makes defence, never did I see better.
 He himself without companions sallied out by force.

² In MS. Linc. the reading is, “ You will see him at London in fifteen days from this.”

His people did not wish that he should be there disgraced ;
 For they knew very well the king was very bold,
 Towards their lord he had a heart swelling and angry ;
 1660 And if he could take the castle by [his] gathered host,
 He would never have mercy on Odinel in his court.
 Odinel departed very sorry from his people,
 And they remained within like bold knights.

Great was the host of Scotland, the noise and the cry.
 With Flemings and Border-men the castle was assaulted ;
 And those within defended themselves with strength and valour,
 For so many wounded outside were knocked down,
 They will never see the relations which they had.
 And Odinel goes off on his hairy bay horse
 1670 To ask for succour that he might be relieved.

Then Odinel rode so much on the good brown bay,
 Day and night always spurring,
 That he gathered good valiant people,
 Four hundred knights with their shining helmets.
 They will be in the battle fighting with him,
 They will succour Prudhoe with their trenchant swords.

Three days lasted the siege, to my knowledge :
 Odinel had many good men there within.
 Against the Flemings they defend themselves bravely.
 1680 They did not lose within, I assure you I tell no lie,
 As much as amounted to a silver penny ;
 But they lost their fields with all their corn,
 And their gardens were ravaged by those bad people ;
 And he who could not do more injury, took it into his head
 To bark the apple-trees : it was bad vengeance.

When king William saw that he could not succeed,
 Nor take the castle by arrows nor by spears,
 He spoke in private to his good counsellor :

“ Let us go to Alnwick, let us leave this one alone.
 1690 You will not see with your eyes this first month elapse,
 Before Odinel will hold it to his great trouble.
 Never will we go from it until we have first had it.
 Let us allow our Scots to waste the sea-coast—
 Woe to them if they leave standing a house or a church ;
 And we will allow the Galloway-men to go in another direction,
 To kill the men in Odinel’s land :
 We will go to Alnwick to besiege the castle,
 And both our hosts shall come to help our Frenchmen ;
 But they will have first made so great a disturbance, 1700 That this country will be destroyed. Now let us think of hastening.”

It was on Thursday evening that the king spoke,
 And Frenchmen and Flemings agreed to his words.
 Friday in the morning his trumpet was sounded :
 This great host departed and his fierce baronage,
 And come to Alnwick ; they did not delay longer ;
 But the Scots burnt and wasted the country.

The church of Saint-Laurence¹ was that day violated,
 Three priests in the church were by force castrated,
 And three hundred men murdered, without a word of falsehood ;
 1710 Never will they see a relation or any of their kindred.
 And Odel de Umfranvile has so well managed,
 Such succour has gained, so help me Lord God,
 That the king of Scotland will be enraged at heart ;
 No relation that he had was ever so disgraced.
 The king was at Alnwick with his great gathered host ;
 And Odel rides with the fierce company,
 William² d'Estutevile who helps him very much,
 And Ralph de Glanvile is not backward,
 Lord Bernard de Baliol³ with his furbished sword
 1720 Will lay hard upon the people of Albany,
 And William de Vesci do not forget there.
 The archbishop of York⁴ gave them lodgings,
 And sixty knights of his chivalry.
 To Newcastle-on-Tyne, when the night is advanced,
 Is come Odel, who conducts and guides them :
 That is the truth, whatever anybody may say about it.
 There they heard news of this king of Albany,
 That he was at Alnwick with a small suit.
 With the Flemings and Frenchmen the Scots were not,
 1730 But burn the country each of them at his best.
 If it pleased you to hear a good deed done by good people,
 I will tell you of this, of my own knowledge.
 They have consulted together what they should do and how,
 If they should go and attack this king and his people.
 Thus answers Odel : " Shame to him that forbids it !
 I will strike there, please God, all at first :
 He has done me a very great harm, and my heart is grieved at it ;
 And if God allowed us to take vengeance,
 We shall make a good job of it, by my knowledge.
 1740 Let us go and attack them ; and, if he waits for us,
 He will be discomfited, and his host likewise."
 Said Bernard de Baliol : " He who has no courage now
 Can have no honour nor anything which appertains to it."
 Said Ralph de Glanvile : " Let us act prudently :
 Let us send a spy to reckon their forces ;
 And we will come afterwards, if God allows us.
 Since the Scots are not there, we do not care the least about them," Odel sends for all his best troops,
 Roger the son of Richard has also sent for his.
 1750 Now have the barons each assumed courage,
 And go to Alnwick by night closely.
 And then in the morning, when the day dawned,
 The king of Scotland had his head well armed

² According to Dugdale (Baron. i. 455), the name of the baron who captured William was Robert, and not William.

³ See the authority last cited, i. 523.

⁴ Archbishop Roger, consecrated A. D. 1154, died 1181.

And five hundred knights in a band,
 Who all keep saying to him : “ Beware of trust to cowardice.
 Yours is Northumberland, whether they weep or laugh.”

And said the king of Scotland : “ We will wait for our host,
 And then with great vigour we shall assault the castle.
 Because of the heat, which is great, lords, let us dine.”

1760 And he uncovers his head, very well we know it :
 We who compose this history do not wish to lie.

Before the castle the king had stopped ;
 His servants bring him what he has dined upon.
 And our knights went into a copse ;
 There they have their spy who told them all.
 Says Ralph de Glanvile : “ Thank the Lord God !
 Now take your arms, beware of being fearful.”
 Then might you see knights quickly stirring,
 Mounting on their horses and their arms seizing ;

1770 There will be no impediment to keep them from attacking them :
 That which one of them wishes, pleases the other.

The king of Scotland was brave, wonderful and bold,
 Before Alnwick he stood unarmed.

I do not relate a fable as one who has heard say,
 But as one who was there, and I myself saw it.
 When these had once cried the war-signal of Vesci
 And “ Glanvile, knights !” and “ Baliol !” likewise,
 Odinel de Humfreville raised a cry of his own,
 And another that of Estuteville, a bold knight.

1780 Then knew king William that he was nearly betrayed ;
 Quickly he stirred himself, he was not disconcerted.

The king arms himself soon and hastily,
 And mounted on a horse which was not slow,
 And goes to the fight with very great boldness.
 The first whom he struck, he knocks to the ground.
 The fight was very great of the king and his troops.
 Every thing would have gone on well, to my knowledge,
 Were it not for a serjeant who rushes up to him ;
 With the lance which he held, he pierces his horse.

1790 You must not ask if the king was sorrowful :
 The sin of the Scots is an encumbrance to him.
 The king falls to the ground, and the grey horse.

The king and his horse are both on the ground,
 He could not get up, the horse lay upon him :
 Now he has enough of labour and trouble and vexations,
 When servants and esquires pass by him ;
 He will hear news, to my knowledge, to-day ;
 He cannot much help himself nor others.

Great was the battle and stubborn on both sides ;
 1800 You might see darts enough thrown and arrows shot,
 The bold fighting and the cowardly flying.
 Of the unfortunate Flemings great carnage was made,
 [You might see] their bowels dragged from the bodies through the fields ;

Never again in their country will they cry, Arras !

The king lay on the ground thrown down, as I tell you ;
Between his legs lay the horse upon him ;
Never again will he rise from it for relation or friend,
If the horse is not drawn from him, with which he is encumbered ;
He will always be humbled and disgraced.

1810 He was soon taken, with my two eyes I saw it,
By Ralph de Glanvile, to whom he then surrendered ;
And all his boldest knights are taken.
There was no favour : all were enemies.
Our knights on this side, never did I see better,
Love not the Flemings, who had then betrayed them ;
But they keep killing them. I know not what more to say to you.

The king surrenders himself prisoner to Ralph, truly ;
He could not do otherwise, what else could he do ?
And Ralph was glad, when he sees and hears

1820 That the war of the king is really finished.
England is at peace, and the good people
Will no longer dread the Scots : they will not injure them at all.

Ralph de Glanvile has the king in custody,
[And he surrendered to him, and he grants it readily ;
He was not so delighted in any day of his life.]¹
He takes off his armour, and forgets nothing.

On a palfrey mounted this king of Albany ;
So they led him gently, whatever may be said to you.
At Newcastle-on-Tyne they take lodgings,

1830 And the others remained for their knights-service
And take those knights towards Albany.
Now the battle on both sides was well fought.

Certainly, our royal knights behave very well,
And those of Albany were very good vassals ;
But when they had lost what they regarded most,
Their natural lord, who was brought by them,
These are not all loyal to their king,
And they are knocked to the ground from their horses ;
In the midst of the battle they will be taken one and all.

1840 It is no wonder if the gay and the cheerful are sorrowful.

Lord Roger de Mowbray went away flying ;
He behaved courteously, what should he wait for ?
All are his enemies, who are there fighting ;
And if they can take him, there will be no safeguard
From the king of England executing his pleasure on him.
And lord Adam de Porz, a very valiant baron,
Went away with him. Now they go spurring on.
It was well for them, God is a great guard to them,
For they were not caught by any man alive.

1850 Certainly, if Adam de Porz had not been so far advanced,
He would have lost that day the little and the great ;
But God did not consent to it, who is a powerful King ;
It would have been too great damage, for he is very valiant.

- Now I will tell you who were fighting well
 Before Alnwick, the castle of which I sing :
 Lord Alan de Lanceles, as long as he was standing,
 Defended himself on the grey war-horse.
 He was very old, a very great knight,
 He had not jousted full thirty years before ;
 1860 But was a good knight and of great knowledge.
 If the king had known it, his word would have been welcome
 Lord Alan was then taken and kept ;
 Now he must give ransom, for his property is great.
 William de Mortimer¹ behaved very well that day
 He goes among the ranks like a mad boar,
 Gives great blows and often takes his share of them ;
 He found opposed to him a true knight,
 Lord Bernard de Baliol, of whom you hear me speak ;
 He knocked down him and his charger,
 1870 He put him on parole; as is done for a knight.
 Lord Bernard does well, he is not to be blamed ;
 At the end of the battle he will be praised
 Who strikes best with sword and best fights.
 Raoul le Rus behaved well, but could not hold long :
 More than one hundred attacked him, so as to impede him completely.
 If then he surrendered, it is no wonder ;
 Unhappy man to have seen this war : he will pay very dear for it.
 Certainly Richard Maluvel behaved himself gloriously,
 He gave enough of great blows, and he takes enough,
 1880 As long as he was on horseback he feared nothing ;
 He had a very good horse, good are his equipments,
 And himself bold and brave, so I say without any falsehood.
 He did on that day, to my knowledge,
 As much as thirteen followers then present with him ;
 But he loses the war-horse : for which he is very sorry.
 It is struck through, and falls immediately :
 It is a great pity, for he will be very sorry for it.
 And over lord Richard stood many people ;
 There was none that did not say : " Surrender directly."
 1890 He therefore surrendered himself with very great unwillingness ;
 Woe to him that he saw king William and his wild rashness.
 I cannot tell you, it would be too long,
 All those who were taken and led away with sorrow ;
 But I will count to you nearly a hundred,
 Whom William de Vesci ransomed quite at his pleasure.
 And Bernard de Baliol and the other good people,
 Walter de Bolebec,² Odinel likewise,
 Had prisoners at their departure.
 Lords, do not marvel if they are discomfited :
 1900 The Scots have this day more than a thousand badly wounded,
 And death has parted the sons from their fathers.

² See Dugd. Baron. i. 452. The Lincoln MS. incorrectly reads "Holebec."

One might see the grief, the tears and the cries
Which these wretches make in the monastery of Saint-Laurence;¹
Some have their bodies and breasts cut open.

The shorn priests were not spared there :
There is no occasion to ask if God is provoked at it
And if He detested king William for it ;
For his sin are many severely wounded,
And he himself was there on that day discomfited.

1910 As far as I know, now hear the truth :

The king of England had then arrived,
And in the morning was then reconciled to saint Thomas.
When the king of the Scots was taken and brought,
At Newcastle-on-Tyne he was lodged at night,
And Ralph de Glanville conducted him from thence.
Now he comes to Richmond, where he must sojourn
Until king Henry shall make known his pleasure.

The king was truly at saint Thomas the martyr's,
Where he confessed himself guilty, sinful and repentant,
1920 And took his penance, do not consider it a light one ;
He took leave of it, he would not stay there ;
He wished to go to London, where he had great desire to go,
To see his city and his good people.
For the war of Scotland they have sorrowful hearts,
They feared much the king, and he is very sorry for it ;
But he will soon hear quite differently,
That all his enemies have taken flight.

When they heard news of the king at London,
Each equipped himself richly for his own part ;
1930 In rich stuffs of silk they were variously dressed,
There is none that has not an ambling palfrey ;
And they issue from the town in a marvellous procession.
He ought to be a king truly who has such people under him.

Certainly, lord Henry le Blunt was the very first
Who went forward to kiss his lord.
You might easily have gone a league of land,
So long did the embracing of the king and his barons last ;
And the king of England begins to thank them :
They are very loyal subjects, so he says to them at first ;
1940 And they thank him as their liege lord.

“ Sire,” so said Gervase Suplest, “ let it be.
Let it not please the Lord God who made land and sea
That any one should call the Londoners traitors !
They would not commit treason if their limbs were cut off.”
— “ Certainly,” so says the king, “ they may boast
And I will requite them, if they have need of mc.”
Thus they accompany the king to Westminster.

The Londoners rejoice at the arrival of their lord,
They give him presents and they pay him great honour ;
1950 But he was pensive and somewhat distracted
For the king of Scotland who was raging,

And Roger de Mowbray, a noble warrior,
 Who were destroying his land by night and by day.
 But before the right hour of sleeping came,
 There reached him such news as gave him great honour.

The king had gone into his own private room
 When the messenger came; he had undergone much fatigue:
 He had neither drunk nor eaten three days of the week,
 Nor closed his eyes on account of the certain news;
 1960 But day and night he wearies himself in travelling:
 He did very wisely, he will have a handsome present.

The king was leaning on his elbow and sleeping a little,
 A servant was at his feet who rubbed them gently;
 There was no noise nor cry, and nobody spoke there,
 No harp nor violin was heard there at all,
 When the messenger came to the door and softly called.
 And says the chamberlain: "Who are you there?"
 — "A messenger am I, friend; now come nearer.
 Lord Ralph de Glanville sent me here
 1970 To speak with the king, for he has great need of it."
 And said the chamberlain: "In the morning let it be done."
 — "By my faith!" said the messenger, "but I must speak to him instantly.

My lord has in his heart grief and vexation:
 So allow me to enter, kind chamberlain."
 And says the chamberlain: "I dare not do it.
 The king is asleep: you must withdraw."
 While thus they speak the king awoke,
 And heard a crying at the door: "Open! open!"
 — "Who is there?" said the king; "you must tell me."
 1980 — "Sire," said the chamberlain, "you shall know it directly.
 It is a messenger from the north, you know him very well:
 A man of Ralph de Glanville's; Brien is his name."
 — "By my faith!" said the king, "now I am very sorrowful:
 He wants help, let him come in."
 The messenger entered, who was very well bred
 And saluted the king, as you may soon hear:
 "Sire king, may God save you, who dwells in Trinity,
 Your own person first, and then all your private friends!"
 — "Brien," said the king, "what news do you bring?"

1990 Has the king of Scotland entered Richmond?
 Is Newcastle-on-Tyne, the fortress, seized?
 Is Odinel de Umfranville taken or driven out?
 And are all my barons ejected from their lands?
 Messenger, by thy faith, tell me the truth.
 They have served me unfortunately, if they be not revenged."
 — "Sire," so said the messenger, "hear me a little.
 Your barons of the north are good folks enough.
 On behalf of my lord hear me graciously.
 He sends you by me greeting and friendship,
 2000 And my lady much more, with whom you are well acquainted.
 [He informs you by me there is no need of your stirring.

The king of Scotland is taken and all his baronage."¹

And says king Henry: "Do you speak the truth?"

— "Yes, sire, indeed, you will know it in the morning:

[The archbishop of York, a wise and learned man,]²

Will send you two private messengers;

But I hastened first, who knew the truth.

I have scarcely slept these four last days,

Neither eaten nor drunk, so I am very hungry;

2010 But, at your pleasure, give me a recompense for it."

And answered the king: "You would be wrong to doubt it.

If you have told me the truth, you are rich enough.

Is the king of Scotland taken? tell me the truth."

— "Yes, sire, by my faith! May I be nailed to a cross,

Or hanged by a rope, or burnt at a great stake,

If to-morrow, ere noon, it be not all confirmed!"

— "Then," says king Henry, "God be thanked for it,

And saint Thomas the martyr and all the saints of God!"

Then the messenger went to his inn,

2020 He has great plenty to eat and drink;

And the king is so glad in the night and so delighted

That he went to the knights and awoke them all:

"Barons, awake, it is a good night for you.

I have heard such a thing as will make you glad:

The king of Scotland is taken, so I have been told for truth.

Just now the news came to me when I ought to have been in bed."

And say the knights: "Now thanks be to the Lord God;

Now the war is finished, and your realm in peace."

Very fine seemed this night to king Henry.

2030 Next day, before noon, news came to him

From the archbishop of York whom they call Roger,

Who salutes his lord who leads the loyal.

When the king sees the messengers, never was he more glad;

And sees that they say the same thing, so he answered them:

"Last night I heard the news when I was much displeased;

To him who brought it me, reward shall be given."

He seized a switch, and handed it to Brien,

Ten liveries of his land for the trouble he had.

Hastily he takes his messengers, and sent them to David

2040 Who was brother of the king of Scotland; never did I see a better man.

He was at Leicester as vassal brave and bold;

But he never was so sorrowful, as when he heard that message.

The king of England informs him the circumstances are such,

There is nothing but to surrender and to ask for his mercy.

David knew not in all the world better advice,

But to surrender the castle and then to come to king Henry.

Lords, all this business was done thus in eight days:

The king of England has peace, all his enemies are taken.

Now he orders the king of Scotland to be led to him quickly;

¹ These two lines occur only in the Lincoln MS, instead of the two preceding ones.

² Omitted in the Lincoln MS.

- 2050 For news came to him, that he must cross the sea :
 His city Rouen is besieged ; he would not stay longer.
 He takes David away with him, and goes to the sea ;
 And Brien returned, who has no mind to stay ;
 And he said to his lord that he must immediately bring
 The king of Scotland to Southampton : the king desires he should pass the sea.
 Henry the king, the son of Matilda, in a lucky hour may he have been born !
 He waits at Southampton for wind and weather and a good breeze ;
 And lord Ralph de Glanvile makes haste to travel,
 He brings with him the king of Scotland, who has a very sorrowful heart.
- 2060 Ralph de Glanvile and the king of Albany
 Hasten to reach the king and his fleet.
 The king had a good breeze, so he did not wait for them ;
 When they came to Southampton, he was in Normandy.
 I will tell you the truth, whatever any body may tell you.
 The king had commanded on limb and life
 Ralph de Glanvile, who had him in custody,
 That he should cross in haste, and should not tarry.
 The king arrived at Rouen, when the dawn appeared.
 Before the evening came, peace was established ;
- 2070 And the king came to France with his great gathered host
 And he has gone to France. The war is now finished.

after the destruction of the city by the Pagan army, after the cruel massacre of the innocent people, and after the plunder of the church, was led forth in chains, and, after being subjected to various sorts of torture for seven months, was at last stoned by the hands of the exasperated Pagans, and received the crown of martyrdom.

The gates, too, the cellars, refectories, dormitories, and all other requisite offices, and all the buildings within the boundary-wall of the court, together with the boundary-wall itself, he built in a style that excited the wonder of beholders. He also bestowed upon the church the special ornament of a valuable library, and many of the books which it contained were corrected with his own hand. The archbishop of York, and other prelates of this kingdom, who had revolted from their subjection to this church, he brought back to their due and bounden submission. By his means, too, and by his active exertions, the church recovered all those lands which are mentioned in the anniversary day of king William, and which had, for a long time, been forfeited. Outside the city walls he erected large dwelling-houses, which he filled with the poor and infirm, whom he caused to be fed and clothed at his own cost and charges. In like manner he erected, outside the city, the church of St. Gregory, in which he placed clerks, by whom those who died without leaving means for their interment might be received without any charge, and be borne thither, and then be decently buried. In the manors that belonged to the archbishop he built many handsome churches; and provided many very beautiful mansions, both to minister to the enjoyment and dignity of the archbishops, and to the comfort of those poor persons who were so much and so laboriously engaged in making ready the dwellings for the reception of the archbishop. He also built the church of Rochester from its foundation, and never ceased until he had completed it in a beautiful manner; he likewise embellished it with many elegant ornaments. Moreover, he introduced the venerable religious observances of the monks; and he recovered lands which had been alienated for a long time from the church, and allowed the monks to hold them as a means of providing themselves with food and raiment. He also laid the foundation of the church of St. Alban's, and nearly finished it; he likewise enriched it with many valuable ornaments.

¹ The MS. Nero C. ix. refers his death to the fifth of the kalends of October [27th Sept.].

² The MS. last quoted ascribes his death to the fifth of the kalends of October [27th Sept.], and the obituary of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, to the fourth of the kalends of November [29th Oct.].

³ According to the obituary of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and an early Saxon calendar of the church of Winchester, he died upon the eighth of the kalends of March [22d Feb.]; but the obituary of Ely refers his decease to the ninth of the kalends of March [21st Feb.].

Let the obit of Lanfranc be recited in its order, although it occur in Whitsun week. As often as the anniversary of lord archbishop Lanfranc is announced in the chapter, let all the brethren proceed in a body to the church, singing "Verba mea," the bells all ringing in the meantime. After supper, when the bell rings to vigils, let all assemble, as usual; let them spend the vigils in festivity; let two sing the third response; three, the sixth; and four, the ninth. On the morrow each priest is to chant one mass for him; and let those who do not chant mass, chant fifty psalms. Let the mass be joyfully celebrated by the convent, in albs; at which let there be a singer and two other brethren with him, clad in copes; three for the response; four for the tract, likewise in copes. On the same day the treasurers are to give forty shillings to feed the poor. The service of the refectory is to be performed in a gladsome manner, as on the festival of an apostle. Let the church continue fitted up, as at the festival of St. Augustine, until service is over.

THOMAS BECKET.

The fourth of the nones of December [2d Dec.]. On the same day returned from exile St. Thomas the martyr, who, after lingering sufferings, by which he shone forth daily a fresh martyr, like gold thrice tried in the furnace, and then deposited in the royal treasures, was in the seventh year called by the Lord to receive the palm, under the test of the sword, as if, when the swords were shown him, he were addressed by the Lord:—"Friend, wherefore art thou come?"

The fourth of the kalends of January [29th Dec.]. On this day occurred, at Canterbury, the Passion of the venerable father Thomas, of the same city, archbishop, and a glorious martyr. He, after the tedious pains of exile, which he patiently endured for righteousness' sake, at last, through Divine compassion, was restored, and after having been honourably received in his church, was, in defence of liberty herself, in the same church, struck dead by the swords of wicked men. Thus did the vigorous champion, having held out in conflict to the last, laurelled with his own blood, and like a distinguished victor, joyfully ascend to Christ, in whose defence he had faithfully contended. His glory is witnessed by a perpetual recurrence of miracles, which, after his passion, followed in such numbers, and are still so multiplied daily, that we can scarcely find, up to the present time, any saint in whose behalf so many have been wrought.

The nones of July [7th July]. On the same day was the translation of St. Thomas the martyr, archbishop of Canterbury, in the year of grace 1220, but in the fiftieth of the passion of the same martyr, on the third day of the week. So that on one and the same day he was born to affliction, suffered unto glory, and was translated to honour. In whose translation the Lord showed forth the miracles of his passion; in order that while old miracles were renewed by the occurrence of fresh ones, the martyr might appear the more glorious by the effulgence of signs and wonders.

BONIFACE.

On the fifteenth of the kalends of August [18th July], died archbishop Boniface, of happy memory. Be it remembered, That in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and sixty-three, John de Westgate, then sub-prior, and the chapter of Christ Church, Canterbury, being at that time left destitute of the government of a prior, [intimated]² to lord Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury [their intention] of keeping his anniversary every year after his decease, in form underwritten:—

¹ So the MS.; but there is obviously some confusion here. The true date of Hubert's death is 13th July. See Hardy's Le Neve, i. 10.

² The text is here imperfect; the words within brackets have been supplied to complete the sense.

“ To the reverend father and lord, lord Boniface, by the grace of God, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, John, the sub-prior, and the chapter of Christ Church, Canterbury, send health, and both devoted and due obedience and reverence in the Lord.

“ Be it known to you, reverend father, that we have with devoted affection designed, with joyful mind decreed, and with the common consent of the brethren ordained, (according to our sense of your noble clemency, which we still find in you, and in past transactions have always experienced,) that you shall participate in all the benefits and advantages which have accrued, and shall hereafter accrue, to our church; adding thereto our special prayers in the Lord, that He would preserve your doings and steps prosperously, not only in this life but also for happier times, according to His own will. Moreover, because it is a holy and salutary thing to pray for those who have died in the faith, that their sins may be forgiven: We have resolved that your anniversary shall be yearly celebrated as a festival in our church, when your race of life is run; so that, on the day of your anniversary, each priest shall celebrate a special mass for the faithful; and that the rest of the brethren, who do not celebrate mass, or, in case of debility, are unable to do so, shall recite fifty psalms for your soul. And we will cause your name to be spread throughout the whole of England, that in every chapter of the religious your soul may by the presidents be fully absolved. In pursuance of this, we have caused this present writing to be transcribed in our Martyrology, that on each returning day of your decease it may be solemnly recited in the chapter; and we have caused the same, sealed with our seal, to be transmitted to you, that it may not be entrusted to the forgetfulness of men, and that what has been piously designed and wholesomely ordained by us, may for ever continue in the recollection of the elders.”

¹ William, according to Godwin and others; concerning him, see Wharton's Angl. Sacra. i. 140.

ROBERT WYNCHELSE.

- On the fifth of the ides of May [11th May] died lord Robert de Wynchylse, of renowned memory, sometime archbishop of Canterbury; he was, indeed, a pastor of more than common eminence, a signal mirror of prelates, in morals and virtue surpassing others. So did he combine modesty of manners with purity of heart; so did he mortify, with watchful vigilance, the insidious provocatives of the flesh, that by many he was believed to live, while in the flesh, above the flesh. His deep-seated firmness never gave way under adversity; nor could he be moved by threats, or seduced by bribes, to desert the path of righteousness. In his lifetime he gave to the church of Canterbury a chasuble, tunic, and dalmatic, together with a very costly cope for the choir, and all his books. At length, having won the victory over the wickedness of this world, on the fifth of the ides of May [11th May], in the year of grace one thousand three hundred and thirteen, at his manor of Ottford, he paid the inevitable debt of all flesh. His body is deposited in the church of Canterbury, near the altar of St. Gregory.
- On the sixth of the kalends of September [27th Aug.] died Thomas de Cobham, bishop of Worcester, of pious memory, formerly [archbishop] elect of Canterbury.

WALTER.

- On the fifteenth of the kalends of December [17th Nov.] died lord Walter, archbishop, of happy memory, who was first bishop of Worcester, and chancellor to our lord the king, and was afterwards translated to the primacy of the church of Canterbury; a man both meek and affable, and specially devoted to the celebration of holy services. He gave to the convent the manor of Caldecote, with the wood of Thorholde, near our barton; and by his charter he confirmed it freely and peaceably for himself and his successors for ever. Let a service be solemnly performed for him in the convent, as for prior Wybert.

SIMON MEPHAM.

- On the fourth of the ides of October [12th Oct.] died lord Simon de Mepham, of happy memory, sometime archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolic see, and doctor of divinity, canonically elected by the chapter, and confirmed at the court of Rome; for whom let a service be solemnly performed in the convent. The executor of his will, master Laurence Falstof, gave to the convent fifty pounds, to purchase an annual payment of forty shillings, to be spent every year on his anniversary.

JOHN STRATFORDE.

On the tenth of the kalends of September [23d Aug.] died lord John Stratforde, archbishop of Canterbury, of pious memory, who gave to his church a cope of great value, together with a most beautiful mitre, and two law books, namely, one of the Decretals, and one of the Decrees. He also assigned to the convent an annual stipend of one hundred shillings from the church of Preston and Boctone, which he made over to the monastery of Feversham; for whom let a service be performed in the convent, as for queen Ediva; and let each priest recite one mass, the rest fifty psalms.

JOHN UFFORD.

On the eleventh of the kalends of June [22d May] died John, [archbishop] elect of Canterbury.

THOMAS BRADWARDYN.

On the seventh of the kalends of September [26th August] died lord Thomas Bredwarden, archbishop of Canterbury.

SIMON ISLIP.

On the sixth of the kalends of May [26th April].—Be it remembered, that, on the sixth of the kalends of May [26th April], about one hour after midnight, in the year of our Lord one thousand three hundred and sixty-six, lord Simon de Iselep, archbishop of Canterbury, of cherished memory, breathed his last at Magefeld. He left and bequeathed certain goods to the prior and convent of his church at Canterbury, in manner following, as by his will manifestly appears:—

“ Item: I bequeath to the prior and convent, who shall officiate at my funeral, for the said day’s service, for one pittance, ten pounds. Item: I bequeath to my chapter, or convent, six dozen of silver dishes, and as many silver saltcellars of the better sort and newly made, and four silver basins with my armorial bearings, with four ewers of the same suit. Item: twenty-four silver cups and six silver tankards for wine, on condition that they be used by the convent in the refectory, and nowhere else; for it becomes the dignity of so great a chapter that (provided they set aside vain glory) they be served and waited upon with more than common state and attendance. And it is my desire that those vessels remain in the custody and possession of the convent. Nor shall it be lawful for the prior, or any other person, of what condition or rank soever he may be, nor even for any successor of mine, contrary to this my last will and sentence of anathema, which, henceforth, he that contravenes it may dread, to take out of the said refectory those vessels, or any portion of them whatsoever, under the pretence of any accommodation or loan, with cause or without cause; nor may the convent lend, abstract, or pawn them, or transfer them to any other use. Item: I bequeath to the prior and his successors, priors of the church of Canterbury, two silver basins, larger and better than those above mentioned, which also have my arms. Item: I bequeath to the prior and convent a thousand ewe sheep, out of the best that I shall possess at the time of my decease. And I will and appoint, that the best and most prolific of their young ones be yearly preserved to keep up the aforesaid number, or to increase it, if it shall please God; otherwise, the wool of at least the same number of sheep shall always be provided. And let whatever wool there is left, or the whole of it, as is aforesaid, with other profits, if such there be, be annually distributed and fairly divided for any necessary uses of the monks, for money or otherwise, as the chapter shall appoint, by the hands of the chamberlain for the time being; in such manner that each of the monks may, on the days of my anniversary, receive what falls to his share, that, so remunerated, they may be able to pray the more specially for my soul. And I will that at least one, two, or three monks, yearly chosen by common consent for this purpose, make a survey of the sheep aforesaid, and take account of the number of heads, and also of the increase or diminution of the number of lambs, and of the profits otherwise accruing, as well from the fleeces as from the sheep themselves; an account of all which matters they shall take, and faithfully report and declare to our chapter. And all these things, besides my golden vestment, which heretofore I have given to my church, together with a valuable cope, I give and bequeath, on this condition, and not otherwise,—that the said prior and convent make for me one perpetual chantry, to be celebrated or made by one of my brethren, or by any secular or religious in my church aforesaid, according to their appointment, with the consent of my executors for me and for each of the archbishops, as well past as future; and that on each several day, he who so celebrates, and for whomsoever he shall celebrate, be bound always to recite this prayer, and according to this form:

“ ‘ O God! who hast caused thy servants Simon, and John, and the rest of the archbishops of this church, to be enrolled among apostolic priests with pontifical and archiepiscopal dignity, grant, we beseech Thee, that they may enjoy in heaven the everlasting society of those whose room they filled on earth.’

“ Item: That each of the monks, priests in the said church, shall, four times a-year, at least once a quarter, when the chapter shall think proper to appoint it, specially celebrate the mass of the blessed Virgin, along with the aforesaid prayer. Item: I will and appoint, that the prior and chapter shall celebrate the anniversary of my decease, and cause the bells to toll solemnly, as is wont to be done for other archbishops. Touching all which matters, so far as they are concerned, let them draw up their letters testimonial, to be sealed with their common seal, and delivered forthwith to my executors."

On the nones of October [7th Oct.], lord William Edynton, bishop of Winchester, died, of happy memory, at one time [archbishop] elect of Canterbury, a benefactor of ours, who, among other benefits of friendship, gave to the convent one hundred marks, that is to say, to each monk one mark; the rest for the necessary use of the church. He also gave to the said church five copes, one chasuble, and three red tunics with their pendicles and suits. On his anniversary, let a service be performed in the convent, as for an archbishop.

On the eighteenth of the kalends of July [14th June] died lord Simon Sudbury, archbishop of this church, of happy memory.

WILLIAM COURTNAY.

On the second of the kalends of August [31st July] died lord William Courtenay, of cherished memory, archbishop of this church, who lived in the archbishopric for upwards of fourteen years. During his life he conferred many benefits upon his church at Canterbury; for instance, he expended, out of his beneficence, upon the building of the nave of the church, of the cloisters, and upon the cellarer's garden, upwards of a thousand marks; he gave to the high altar a valuable cope set with rubies and pearls; a Trinity with six apostles of a hundred and sixty pounds weight; he left, by will, a white vestment with six copes, and a green one with seven copes. As a monk of this church, he was affable, devout, and compassionate. He repaired the church of Mepham, for the use of infirm brethren; and he caused four dwelling-houses to be built at his own cost: for which his anniversary is to be observed yearly, as for lord Simon Islepe, sometime archbishop of this church; and two monks are to perform service for his soul. He also bequeathed to his church at Canterbury six valuable books—the Milleloquium of Augustine, and a Dictionary in three volumes, and Doctor de Lyra in two volumes; which books, according to the will of the said reverend father, are to remain in the possession of master Richard Courtney till the end of his life; and the said books master Richard is to order his executors to give up to the church of Canterbury, after his death, under a penalty of three hundred pounds; as is more fully set forth in a certain written engagement, and in an indenture thence drawn up, which are kept in our chancery.

THOMAS ARUNDELL.

On the eleventh of the kalends of March [19th Feb.] died the most reverend in Christ and Lord, lord Thomas Arundell, archbishop of Canterbury, of cherished memory, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolic see, son of the worthy lord, lord Richard, earl of Arundel and Warren. He was first bishop of Ely, then archbishop of York, and afterwards translated to this holy church of Canterbury, by the unanimous invitation of its prior and chapter. He was a man of singular wisdom, of distinguished genius, cautious and circumspect in everything that was to be done; and in the discharge of his episcopal duty, assiduous and exceedingly earnest. To the sovereigns who reigned during his time, and to the kingdom, he was exceedingly welcome, by reason of the ripeness of his sound advice. Moreover, he was oftentimes chancellor of the same kingdom.

The same lord archbishop also conferred many highly commendable benefits upon this church; for instance,—a green vestment with twenty-one copes of one suit, and another of sumptuous cloth of gold, a gold mitre set with divers gems and precious stones, a large silver pastoral staff gilt all over, a gold chalice for the high altar, with two gold flagons of the value of two hundred marks, and another gold chalice, for the festival of St. Thomas, valued at forty pounds, with various other jewels, three silver basins that hang before the high altar, five bells of exceedingly sweet tone, commonly called “the Arundel Ryng.” He also gave two missals, a great number of valuable books, and other church ornaments. He contributed likewise to the building of the nave of the church a thousand marks; he also procured the annexation and union of the church of Godmersham to this church; out of the fruits and rents of which he desired that six shillings and eightpence should be annually given to each of the monks of this church, on the anniversary of the return of the precious martyr Thomas, in remembrance of him. He also bequeathed to this church a valuable volume containing all the works of St. Gregory, forbidding any one, under penalty of the greater excommunication—which he actually thundered forth—to alienate the volume in any way from the church of Canterbury. And after the death of the said lord archbishop, the executors of his last will, or testament, handed over to the prior and monks of this church a hundred pounds of English money, to be distributed according to the will and pleasure of the then prior of the same church and his brethren. And let it not be forgotten that, among other actions of the same lord archbishop which are worthy of endless praise, he, like a puissant champion of the church, vigorously repressed that faithless sect of the Lollards, which at that time was gaining ground in the kingdom. And at length, in the eighteenth year of his translation to this church, and in the one thousand four hundred and thirteenth of the Incarnation of our Lord, on the eleventh of the kalends of March [19th Feb.], at the rectory of the church of Hakyn-ton, he died with a glorious departure. A service is to be solemnly performed for him for ever in the convent.

HENRY CHICHELE.

On the second of the ides of April [12th April] died lord Henry Chichele, archbishop of this church; to whose soul may the Most High be merciful.

JOHN STAFFORDE.

On the eighth of the kalends of June [25th May] died the most reverend father in Christ and Lord, lord John Stafforde, archbishop of this church, of cherished memory.

JOHN KEMP.

On the eleventh of the kalends of April [22d March] died the most reverend father in Christ and Lord, lord John Kempe, with the title of cardinal bishop of St. Rufina, of the holy Roman church, and archbishop of this holy church of Canterbury.

THOMAS BOURCHIER.

On the third of the kalends of April [30th March] died the most reverend father in Christ and Lord, lord Thomas Bourschyre, with the title of cardinal priest of St. Ciriacus in Terminus, of the holy Roman church, and archbishop of this holy church of Canterbury; who gave to this church the beautiful image of the Trinity, made of gold and set with jewels, and twenty-seven copes of crimson tissue, with full robes, of one suit, for a priest, a deacon, and a sub-deacon.

JOHN MORTON.

On the sixteenth of the kalends of October [16th Sept.] died the most worshipful father in Christ and Lord, lord John Morton, doctor of laws, sometime master of the rolls; he was next bishop of Ely, and he was afterwards translated to the holy church of Canterbury, as to a superior see: lastly, he was made chancellor to the king's majesty, and to the university of Oxford; and so by the supreme pontiff he was honoured with the title of a cardinal priest: for he was animated with the warmest zeal for divine worship, and was a distinguished counsellor of the king's majesty and of the whole commonwealth. And such were this great man's authority and moral courage, that the church of England asserted her dignity and freedom; and if there was anything that appeared to him to have a tendency to advance the glory of that church, he tried to secure it with all his heart, and with his most earnest endeavours; while he warded off with his utmost diligence whatever was calculated to harm her. And such was his affection for his mother—the church of Canterbury—that he bequeathed to her a very valuable gift; that is to say, eighty most costly and richly-ornamented copes, white coloured, with all other things appertaining to a priest, a deacon, and a sub-deacon, with his own name and coat-of-arms, and entirely covered over with the purest gold, and with beautifully formed letters, making up this most pleasing motto, “Deo sit gratiarum actio,” to the praise of God and in memory of himself. He gave also, out of his great munificence, a very beautiful funeral pall, made of black silk, designed for the corpses of the dead, fringed all round with the purest gold. Finally, a large portion of the lantern tower of the church was erected at his cost and charges. Moreover, he had educated at his own expense two brethren, students at the university of Oxford, for the advancement of the orthodox faith, and the preaching of the word of God, for a period of twenty years after his decease, and for seven years during the life of the same venerable father. He would have bestowed, in addition, many other gifts worthy of being recorded, if nature had granted him a longer life; for when, through the goodness of God, he had drawn out this human life, doubtless happily, to nearly his eightieth year, a quartan ague (a disorder peculiarly prejudicial to his constitution) carried him off. And although he had been very often urged by several persons to build for himself a sepulchre of suitable dimensions, sumptuousness, and magnificence, he chose a burial-place, not in open view, not in a place frequented, but in a private spot, underground, within the crypt, covered only with a marble slab, before our image of the most blessed Virgin Mary, whom he loved in his heart: there his happy corpse now reposes. In that place two brethren daily celebrate, with the utmost devotion, two masses, with the “Placebo” and “Dirige,” for his soul, during the space of twenty years. And the said venerable lord appointed for the remuneration of those two brethren forty pence, to be paid weekly, as is more fully set forth in this present book. The Most High grant that his soul may enjoy everlasting rest!

HENRY DENE.

On the fifteenth of the kalends of March [15th Feb.] died lord Henry Dene, archbishop of this church.

On the fifteenth of the kalends of October [17th Sept.] died lord Thomas Wellys,¹ bishop of Sidon, and prior of St. Gregory.

On the thirteenth of the kalends of December [19th Nov.] died the reverend father in Christ, lord Richard Marten,² suffragan, a brother and a benefactor of ours, who gave to Christchurch, Canterbury, a mitre with his pastoral staff.

¹ Prior of the church of St. Gregory at Canterbury, about A.D. 1505, and survived the year 1511. Angl. Sacra, i. 790.

THE END.

HISTORY OF THE ARCHBISHOPS
OF CANTERBURY BY RALPH DE DICETO.

THE HISTORY OF THE ARCHBISHOPS OF CANTERBURY.

From the first foundation of the See, to the Year One Thousand Two Hundred. By Ralph de Diceto.

BE it observed, in the first place, that in the time of the Britons there were three archbishoprics in England;—one in the city of London, to which Loegria and Cornubia were subject; another in York, to which Deira and Albania were subject; the third in the city of the Legions, that is, Kirlyim, which is now called St. David's, to which Cambria was subject. We have not the names of these bishops in full, but some of them are inserted above in the Catalogue of the Kings.¹ A few of these are subjoined:—

ARCHBISHOPS OF LONDON.	ARCHBISHOPS OF YORK.	ARCHBISHOPS OF THE CITY OF LEGIONS.
Guitelinus.	Samson.	Dubricius.
Theonus.	Peramus.	St. David.
	Cadiocenus.

But in the time of the Angli, who were converted by St. Augustine, the metropolitan see was placed at Dorobernia, that is, Canterbury. To this seventeen bishops were subject; but York had only three under it, as has been said (supra 5²). Then the archbishopric of London, which existed in the time of the Britons, and the archbishopric of the city of Legions, were subjected to the archbishop of Canterbury, and the archbishoprics were changed into bishoprics.

Of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

AUGUSTINE, sent to England in the time of St. Gregory, pope, in the year of our Lord five hundred and ninety-six, was first consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. He converted Ethelbert, king of Kent, to the Christian faith, who assigned him his episcopal seat in Dorobernia, that is, Canterbury, his metropolis. Supported by the royal authority, Augustine repaired, for those of the Roman faith, a church that had been erected of old in the time of the Britons, and consecrated it to the name of our Saviour. When Gregory heard of this, he wrote to congratulate him on the conversion of that nation. The same pope wrote also to Theodoric,³ king of the Franks, to thank him for the benefits which he had bestowed upon Augustine and his companions, while they were on their way to England. Meanwhile Augustine, the man of God, went to Arles,¹ and was by Etherius, bishop of that city, consecrated bishop of the nation of the Angli. On his return to Britain, he instantly despatched Laurence, a presbyter, and Peter, a monk, to inform St. Gregory that the people of the Angli had embraced the faith of Christ, and that he himself had been made a bishop. And St. Gregory sent with the forementioned messengers many assistants and preachers of the word of God; among whom the first and chief were Mellitus² and Justus, Paulinus and Rughianus. He also sent a letter,³ in which he informs him that he sends him the pallium, in the eleventh year of his pontificate. He likewise hints to him after what manner he ought to appoint bishops in Britain, writing in these terms:—

“Whereas the pseudo-church⁴ of the Angli hath been brought to the grace of Almighty God, by the blessing of the same Lord and thy exertions, we grant thee the use of the pallium in it, only for the performance of the ceremonies of the mass; also that thou mayest ordain bishops for twelve places, which are to be subject to thy jurisdiction: provided, however, that the bishop of the city of London shall always hereafter be consecrated by a synod of his own, and receive the pallium of honour from this holy and apostolic see, in which, under the providence of God, we minister. We will that thou send a bishop to the city of York, whom thou shalt think proper to ordain; only let it be understood, that if the same city, with its neighbours, receive the word of God, he also is to ordain twelve bishops, and to enjoy the dignity of a metropolitan, whom it is our wish to subject to the jurisdiction of thy fraternity. But after thy decease he is so to preside over the bishops whom he shall have ordained, that he shall in no wise be under the jurisdiction of the bishop of London. And let there henceforth be between the bishops of London and the city of York this distinction—that he is to take precedence who hath been ordained before the other. And let thy fraternity have in subjection the bishops whom thou shalt have ordained, or whom the bishop of York shall have ordained, likewise the priests of the whole of Britain.” Thus far Gregory.

Augustine, the archbishop, ordained Mellitus⁵ bishop of the city of London; Justus, of the city of Rochester; and Laurence instead of himself, lest at his death the condition of a church so rude should, when left without a pastor even for an hour, begin to totter; following in this the example of St. Peter, who appointed Clement to succeed him. He died after he had occupied the see for sixteen years, and was buried near the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, which had not yet been either finished or dedicated. But as soon as it was dedicated by Laurence, his successor, he was removed, with fitting respect, to its north portico,⁶ where the bodies of the archbishops down to Theodore have been deposited.

LAURENCE, who had been sent¹ by St. Gregory, along with St. Augustine, to convert the Angli, was consecrated by St. Augustine in his lifetime; and St. Gregory sent him the pallium, as he had also done to his predecessor Augustine, and to his successor Mellitus likewise, as is set forth in the Chronicles. But this I affirm to be utterly impossible; for both Laurence and Mellitus sate for five years, and Augustine for sixteen years; and it is undeniable that Gregory sate only for thirteen years, six months, and ten days. This Laurence advised Mellitus and Justus, whom Edbald, son of Ethelbert, had ejected from their bishoprics, to retire to Gaul; and when he was intending to pursue them, Peter the apostle flogged him with a scourge. Laurence, after occupying his see for five years, died in the time of the aforesaid king Edbald.

MELLITUS² was the first bishop of London. He was afflicted with the gout, and died when he had sate for five years and sixteen days. His festival is on the eighth of the kalends of May [24th April].

JUSTUS³ was the first bishop of Rochester. To him pope Boniface wrote in these words: "By the authority of St. Peter, we command that henceforth for ever the metropolitan see of the whole of Britain be in the city of Canterbury; and that all the provinces of the realm of the Angli be under the jurisdiction of the aforesaid see of the metropolitan church." The same Boniface sent the pallium to the same [Justus]. He died after he had held the see for three years. His festival is on the fourth of the ides of November [10th Nov.]

HONORIUS⁴ was consecrated by Paulinus, archbishop of York, in the city of Lincoln, in the church which is now called St. Paul's, but in the time of the Angli was called St. Paulinus. To him pope Honorius the first wrote in the following terms: "Whenever the archbishop of Canterbury or of York departs this life, the survivor is to have the power of ordaining the other." The same pope also wrote to this archbishop, sending him the pallium, in these words: "To thy jurisdiction I command that all the churches and districts of England be subject; and that in the city of Canterbury the metropolitan see and archiepiscopal dignity, and the head of all the churches of the Angli, be for ever henceforth established." He died after holding the see for twenty-six years and fifty-five days. After his decease,⁵ the see of the archbishopric was vacant for a year and six months. His festival is on the day before the kalends of October [30th Sept.]

DEUSDEDIT⁶ was consecrated by Itamar, bishop of Rochester. This ought to have been done by the archbishop of York; but Paulinus having been expelled by hostile violence, and having returned into Kent, no one had succeeded to his archiepiscopal rights. Pope Honorius sent him the pallium. He died after he had held the see for ten years; others say nine years, four months,⁷ and two days. After his decease, the see was vacant for three years. His festival is on the day before the ides of July [14th July].

THEODORE,¹ a native of Tarsus, in Cilicia, skilled in secular, ecclesiastical, and philosophical learning, and well acquainted with the Greek and Latin languages, was consecrated at Rome, by pope Vitalian, who sent him the pallium, and wrote to him in these terms: "We commend to thy most learned sanctity all the churches that are in the island of Britain." And so he came into Kent. He was the first of the archbishops of Canterbury to whom every church in England consented to be in subjection. He² accordingly made a general inspection, and ordained bishops in suitable places; and wherever he found anything amiss, he rectified it with their assistance. This Theodore convened a synod in England, in which he made many canons that conduced to the benefit of the church. He also wrote a Provincial book, in which he discriminated, with rare and wary judgment, the various species of sins. He assembled a council of bishops in a place called Heorford,³ at which Wilfrid, bishop of Northumberland, appeared by his own representatives, and other English bishops likewise, to treat concerning the time of Easter, and other matters of importance to the church. He divided the province of the Mercians into five dioceses—Worcester, Lichfield, Leogoria, and Dorchester, ordaining a bishop for each; as Beda mentions, in book fourth, chapter seventeenth. This Theodore also assembled a council of bishops and several doctors at a place called Hethfield,⁴ to satisfy himself touching the religious faith of each of them. There were present at this council, Egfrid, king of Northumberland; Aedelred, king of the Mercians; Aldulph, or Wulfus, king of the East Angli; Clotarius, king of Kent. He died after he had occupied the see for twenty-two years, and the see was vacant after his death for one year. The feast of the translation of the forementioned archbishops, Augustine, Laurence, Mellitus, Justus, Honorius, Deusdedit, and Theodore, and of St. Adrian, abbot, and of St. Mildred, is on the ides of September [13th Sept.]

BRICTWALD,⁵ previously a monk of Glastonbury and an abbot of Reculver, was consecrated by Bregwin, otherwise Godwin, metropolitan of Wales. Vitalian sent him the pallium; and pope Sergius, who succeeded him, wrote to all the bishops of Britain: "We give you notice, that our most dearly-beloved Brictwald, archbishop of the province of Canterbury, appointed, according to ancient custom, primate of all Britain, is there entrusted with the sacred use of the pallium and venerable dalmatic; and we command you to pay implicit obedience to the same archbishop, acting as primate." He died after he had filled the see for twenty-seven years⁶ (some say, nearly twenty-eight) and six months. And observe, that up to this time the archbishops of Canterbury were sent from Rome: thenceforward they were Englishmen.

TADWIN, who had been a presbyter at Brendene,⁷ in the province of the Mercians, was consecrated by Hingwald, bishop of London, and Daniel of Winchester, and Arduif of Rochester, and Aldewyn of Lichfield. Pope Gregory sent him the pallium, and wrote to him in these words :

“ We command every one in England to obey thee, and to regard thee as primate of the whole island.”

He died when he had occupied the see for three years. In his time Beda died.

NOTEHM,¹ presbyter of London, was consecrated at Rome by pope Gregory the second,² who also sent him the pallium. He, when Wilfred returned home in peace, appointed Edrit to be bishop of the South Saxons, that is to say of Chester [Chichester].

[CUTHBERT] He died when he had sate for seventeen years. He was the first that was buried in his church, and all his successors [were so buried] except Jambert.

BREGWIN. He received the pallium from pope Paul. He died three years after.

JAMBERT, at first abbot of St. Augustine at Canterbury, was consecrated at Rome by pope Paul, from whom he likewise received the pallium. In his time Offa, king of the Mercians, quarrelled with the people of Canterbury, out of a desire to secure the archbishopric of Canterbury for the kingdom of the Mercians ; and with this view he wrote a letter to Adrian to urge him to give the pall to Aldulph of Lichfield, and to place six bishops under his jurisdiction. And this annoyance lasted all the time of Jambert. He [died] after he had filled the see for twenty-seven, others say twenty-eight, years.

ADELARD, at first bishop of Winchester, received the pall from pope Adrian. He prevailed upon pope Leo the third, Adrian's successor, to permit the church of Canterbury to enjoy its accustomed privilege, and to have jurisdiction over those bishops whom Offa, king of the Mercians, wished to subject to the archbishop of Lichfield ; and pope Leo sent him an answer in the following terms :

“ We grant to thee, Adelard, and to thy successors, the unquestionable right of causing all the churches of England to acknowledge, as they have done from ancient times, the jurisdiction of thy metropolitan see. And if any shall presume to disobey this our rightful command, we ordain, by apostolical authority, that if he be a bishop or an archbishop, he be deprived of the episcopal order ; and that if he be a presbyter, or a deacon, or any other member of the sacred function, he be deposed from his order ; but if he be a layman, whether king, or prince, or any other person, high or low, let him consider himself as excommunicated.”

Adelard died after occupying the see for thirteen years.

WULFRED was consecrated at Rome by pope Leo the third ; and he died after he had sat for thirty-eight, some say twenty-eight, years.³

³ A. D. 804—829.

FEOLGILD, that is, SUNDRED, received the pallium from pope John, and he died after occupying the see for three years.¹ The see was vacant for one year.

CENOD, or CHELNOTH, received the pall from Gregory the sixth, and was consecrated by him at Rome. He died after he had sat for forty-one years.

ETHELRED was consecrated at Rome by pope Adrian the second; and he died when he had sat for eighteen years. After his decease the see was vacant for two years.

PLEIMUND was consecrated at Rome by pope Formosus. He consecrated Edward, son of Alured, king of England. This Pleymund presided at a council which king Edward had assembled, in which it was decreed that every district of the Gewiseans, that is of the West Saxons, which had been deprived of a bishop for seven years, should be again restored; and that where there had formerly been two, there should thenceforth be five. When the council was dismissed, the archbishop proceeded to Rome, carrying with him presents to testify his respect, and by his marked humility made friends with the pope; and he recited the king's decrees, which gratified the pope still more. On his return to his own country, he ordained for the churches, in one day, in the city of Canterbury, seven bishops (as is mentioned above).² The pope confirmed all this, by damning for ever any one that should annul this edict. The same pope, Formosus, wrote to the bishops of England, respecting the privileges of the church of Canterbury, to this effect:

“It is certain, as we find by the rescripts of pope St. Gregory and his successors, that the chief episcopal see of the metropolitan is in the city of Canterbury. And as pope Gregory made all the bishops of the Angles subject to Augustine the first bishop of your nation, so we confirm the same dignity to Pleymund, archbishop of Canterbury, and his lawful successors.”

Pleymund died after he had sat for thirty-four years.

ATHELM, first a monk of Glastonbury, and afterwards first bishop of Wells, received the pall from John. He consecrated Athelstan, king of England. He died when he had sat for ten years.

WULFELM, previously bishop of Wells, received the pallium from pope John. He died after holding the see for ten years.

ODO, first bishop of Salisbury, that is, of Malmesbury, received the pall from pope Agapetus. Odo made a stout resistance from the very first, because he had not been a monk; for up to that time he had never known any one to be made an archbishop, unless he had worn the habit of a monk. But when all the bishops complied with the wishes of king Athelstan, he at last overcame his scruples, and, having crossed the sea, assumed the monastic attire; and, returning to England, was held in high estimation in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury by Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. And Edmund, Athelstan's brother, and Edred were, in like manner, consecrated kings by him on two subsequent occasions.

² A reference to an earlier portion of Diceto's history.

This Odo took a journey into Northumberland, and removed the relics of bishop Wilfred from the church of Ripon to Canterbury. This Odo is called the Holy. He also consecrated as king, Edwin, the son of Edmund. Odo was distinguished for his talents, and commendable for his piety. He died after he had sat for twenty-four years.

GLISO,¹ previously bishop of Winchester, who, while on his way to Rome to obtain the pall, was frozen to death in the Alps.

BRICTELM, previously bishop of Wells, was elected archbishop; but, by common consent, he was sent back to his own diocese, as he seemed to be good for nothing. Dunstan was then chosen.

DUNSTAN, at that time abbot of Glastonbury, when he was trying to reclaim king Edwin, was by that king proscribed, and forced to cross the sea. He was recalled from exile, however, by king Edgar, [Edwin's] successor, and was made bishop of the church of Worcester. But king Edgar committed to his superintendence the church of London, which had been deprived of its own pastor. And so Dunstan had the care of the church of London, although he had not the title. At last he was made archbishop of Canterbury, as we have said. He also consecrated the same Edgar as king; and Edward the Martyr, his son; and Egelred, Edgar's son by another wife. At Dunstan's suggestion king Edgar enriched the church of Glastonbury with numerous and valuable possessions, and drove the clerks out of the most of the churches of England, and placed monks in their stead.

Pope John the sixteenth wrote to Dunstan in these terms:—“We confirm thy primacy, in which it is thy duty to discharge the office of the apostolic see, after the manner of thy predecessors, as fully as St. Augustine, and his successors, archbishops of the church of Canterbury, are known to have held it.” [See several remarkable things respecting him above, where² we treat of the kings].

This Dunstan was a nephew of Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, of whom mention is made above. St. Dunstan died after he had sat for twenty-seven years.

ETHELGAR, formerly a monk of Glastonbury, and afterwards first abbot of the New Monastery at Winchester, and at length bishop of Selsey, that is, Chichester, received the pall from John. He occupied the see for only fifteen months.

SIRIC, previously bishop of Wilton, that is, Salisbury, received the pall from pope John. He had been originally a monk of Glastonbury, and, on being made archbishop, he gave seven palls to the place of his education, with which the whole of the old church is decorated on his anniversary. He died after he had sat for five years. He drove the clerks out of Canterbury, and put monks in their room.

ALURIC received the pall from pope John. He had previously been bishop of Wilton, that is, Salisbury. He died after he had sat for eleven years.

ELPHEGE was previously prior of Glastonbury, next first abbot of Bath, and then bishop of Winchester. He received the pall from pope John. He was murdered by the Danes in the seventh year of his archiepiscopate, after he had sat for six years and seven months. His body was carried the day after to London, where it was buried in the church of St. Paul by the bishops of London and Lincoln. But it was afterwards brought back to Canterbury in the time of king Cnut.

LIVING, called also ETHELSTAN, was previously bishop of Wells. He received the pall from pope Benedict the ninth. He consecrated Edmund Ironside, and afterwards Cnut, king of Denmark. He died when he had sat for seven years.

ETHELNOD, otherwise EGELNOTH, son of earl Egelmar, dean of the church called Christchurch, in Hampshire, and afterwards, as is said, bishop of Lincoln. He was called "Ethelnod the Good." He went to Rome, where pope Benedict the ninth gave him a distinguished reception, and presented him with the pall. He had been originally a monk of Glastonbury. At his suggestion king Cnut sent large sums of money to the churches beyond sea, among which he very richly endowed Chartres. He also consecrated Harald, son of Cnut, and likewise Hardicnut, king of England. He died on the fourth of the kalends of November [29th Oct.], when he had sat for eighteen years. On the day of his death Ethelric, bishop of Sussex, also died, for he used to pray, that he might not long survive the departure of his father Ethelnod.

EDSY, or ELSY, king Harald's chaplain, bishop of Winchester, received the pall [from pope Alexander¹]. He consecrated St. Edward, son of Egelred, king of England. The same Edsy, on being seized in the following year with a painful disorder, appointed Siward, abbot of Abingdon, his successor; having previously communicated his design to the king and earl Godwin, lest he should be deemed unfit, either for love or money, to aspire to so high a dignity. But Siward did not obtain it. He died after he had sat for eleven years.

ROBERT, who had been previously bishop of London. He was first a monk and abbot of Jumiéges, and afterwards bishop of London. He was a Norman by birth. He received the pall from Alexander. The modern English find fault with him, and give out that he betrayed Godwin and his children, and sowed discord between the king and the nobles, and that he purchased the archbishopric: wherefore both Robert himself and the rest of the Normans were expelled from England. He went, however, to Rome for the purpose of appealing to the apostolic see respecting his cause: but, on his way home, he died at Jumiéges, and was buried there in the church of the Holy Virgin, which he had himself erected in costly style. He sate for only two years.

STIGAND, Harald's chaplain, was originally bishop of the East Angles—from which office he was deposed—and next bishop of the South Saxons, that is, of Chichester, and at length bishop of Winchester. While Robert was yet alive, and an exile from England, he seized upon the archbishopric by imposing upon the simplicity of king Edward. For at first he had been bishop of the South Saxons; but, in the hope of obtaining a more elevated seat, he deserted that see, and, removing to that of Winchester, held it along with the archbishopric. Wherefore he would never have been considered worthy of receiving the pall from the apostolic see, had not Benedict the tenth, an invader of the apostolate, sent it to him, doubtless either bribed by money to grant it, or because bad men like to gratify those that resemble them. For this reason he was degraded at Rome by the cardinals in the time of William the first, and, although he had been put in irons for life, he could not controul his insatiable avarice even while he lay upon his death-bed; for no sooner was the life out of his body than a key was found secreted upon his person, which, on being applied to the lock of a coffer attached to his bed, revealed incalculable treasures. Upon this a great Council was held at Winchester, in Easter-week, in the year of our Lord one thousand and seventy, at the command and in the presence of king William, and with the consent of pope Alexander the second, at which the aforesaid Stigand was degraded for three reasons:—First, because he had unlawfully kept possession of the bishopric of Winchester along with the archbishopric; and because while archbishop Robert was still living he had not only seized upon the archbishopric, but in the celebration of mass made use of his pall, which was left at Canterbury while he was illegally expelled from England; and because he had afterwards accepted the pall from Benedict the tenth, whom the Church of Rome had excommunicated for taking possession of the apostolic see by bribery. At this council Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, attended with a complaint touching the property of his church, which had been detained by the archbishop of York. As for Stigand, he was cast into prison by the same king, and there died. It is said in the life, or legend,¹ of saint Edward the king, that his belly burst, and that all his bowels gushed out. He was the first that discharged the archiepiscopal functions in the clerical habit. He died after he had sat for seventeen years; and the see was vacant after his deposition for two years.

LANFRANC, a Lombard by birth, a man of profound and universal learning, deeply skilled in the knowledge of all the liberal arts, and of sacred and secular literature, was equally endowed also with the greatest wisdom in counsel and in the management of worldly affairs. Originally a monk of Bec, and abbot of Caen, he was consecrated at Canterbury, on the feast of St. John the Baptist [29th Aug.], by Giso, bishop of Wells, and Walter, bishop of Hereford. He went to Rome for the pall, and took with him, as companions of his journey, Thomas, archbishop of York, (whom he had consecrated at Canterbury, after receiving from him a canonical profession of his subjection to himself,) and Remigius, bishop of Lincoln. On his arrival he was presented to pope Alexander the second. On his entrance the pope rose to him, to stop him, courteously addressed him, and then added, “We have shown thee a mark of respect which we owe, not to thy archbishopric, but to a master to whose labours we are indebted for the knowledge we possess. It is fit that thou shouldst receive what is thy due, out of reverence for St. Peter," He then sat down; and Lanfranc went forward, and cast himself down at his feet; but he instantly raised him up, and kissed him. Having at length returned with his companions to England, he was confirmed in the primacy of the whole realm. In his time religion was extraordinarily diffused throughout the land by the erection of new monasteries; and to the construction of such edifices he himself showed the way by building Christchurch at Canterbury, with all the offices connected with it, that are within the wall of the court, together with that wall itself.

Afterwards a general council was held in the year of our Lord one thousand and seventy-two, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of Alexander, and in the seventh year of the reign of William; and here was pleaded the cause touching the primacy of Canterbury over that of York. It was shown and made apparent by the authority of various records, that the church of York is bound to submit to that of Canterbury, and to comply in all things with the regulations of its archbishop, as the primate of all England, in such matters as pertain to the Christian religion. But the archbishop of Canterbury consented that the archbishop of York and his successors should retain all that is beyond the river Humber, together with the subjection of the bishop of Durham. So that, if the archbishop of Canterbury should think proper to convene a council, whenever he thinks fit, the archbishop of York is to make his appearance, at his direction, together with all that are subject to him, and to be obedient to his canonical decrees. Lanfranc also showed that from ancient practice he [Thomas] ought to make his profession to the archbishop of Canterbury upon oath; but, out of regard for the king, he dispensed with an oath from Thomas, and received only his written profession; but, in this instance, without prejudice to his successors. But if the archbishop of Canterbury should happen to die, then the archbishop of York is to come, and, together with the rest of the bishops, is to consecrate him who shall be elected. But if the archbishop of York shall happen to die, he who is to succeed him is to be elected, and, having accepted the archbishopric, as a gift from the king, must go to the archbishop of Canterbury, and receive ordination from him. To this ordinance king William, and Hubert the legate of our lord the pope, and all that were present gave their consent. This affair was first discussed at Winchester, at Easter, in the chapel royal in the castle, but was afterwards definitively settled at Windsor, in the presence of the king, and the bishops, and the abbots, who had been assembled at the court, at the feast of Pentecost.

This Lanfranc consecrated William Rufus, son of William the first, as king. Among the other benefits conferred by him, he restored twenty-five manors to the church of Canterbury, and repaired the church of Rochester, and ordained Hernost, a monk of Bec, bishop of it. He likewise restored the abbey of St. Alban's to its pristine condition, and placed in it abbot Paul, who established there the order of Bec as it remains to this day. He died on the ninth of the kalends of June [24th May], after he had sat for nineteen years. The see was vacant for four years after his decease, in consequence of the oppression which the church of England suffered at the hands of king William Rufus.

ANSELM, originally abbot of Bec, obtained the archbishopric in the fourth year of the oppression of the church of England, in the year of our Lord one thousand and ninety-three, on the first Sunday of Lent, being the day before the nones of March [6th March]. He was a Lombard by birth, a native of the city of Aosta. His father's name was Gundulph, his mother's, Hermenberga. After receiving the rudiments of learning in his childhood, he crossed the Alps, and studied the liberal arts in Gaul for three years, with great assiduity. Passing into Normandy, he attached himself to [Lanfranc] the prior of Bec, who, as has been already mentioned, at that time conducted the public schools, by order of abbot Herlewin; and by his advice he assumed the monastic habit in the twenty-seventh year of his age. But Lanfranc, after having been appointed to superintend the monastery of Caen, and having been made abbot of that place, Anselm was made prior of Bec, within three years of the time when he assumed the habit. Afterwards, on the death of abbot Herlewin, he was himself consecrated abbot of Bec. Finally, William the second, king of England, four years after the death of Lanfranc, being brought very near to his end, his attendants persuaded him to turn his thoughts to the church of Canterbury, now for a long time widowed. Accordingly, he, having taken advice with them touching that matter, in a council of nobles, caused abbot Anselm to be summoned with all speed from Normandy, and to be raised to the archbishopric. And so, against his will, but with the consenting voices of the suffragans, he was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, on the fourth of the nones of December [4th Dec.], in the sixtieth year of his age, by Walkelin, bishop of Winchester, acting for Maurice, bishop of London. But the king, getting well again afterwards, was exasperated against him by the instigation of wicked men, because the archbishop would not pillage his men to give the king a thousand pounds by way of acknowledgment for his munificence,—in giving his assent to his consecration. Wherefore, he chose rather to incur the king's resentment, than to undergo the risk of ruining his soul for ever, and the imprecations of many in the church of God. But, in order to the effectual performance of his functions, he asked the king's leave to go to pope Urban for the pall. But the king fired at the mention of Urban's name, and declared that he did not look upon him as a pope; nor was it his practice to permit any one to name who should be pope in his realm without his approbation. For, at this time, there was a schism in the Roman church; Wibert, archbishop of Ravenna, having been thrust in by the violence of the emperor Henry. Hence a grievous dissension arose between the king and the clergy; insomuch that all the bishops, except Gundulf of Rochester, holding aloof from the king, refused him subjection and obedience. It was accordingly made known to the archbishop, by means of messengers, that there could be no safety either for himself or his friends, unless he protested openly that he would have nothing to do with pope Urban's mandate. But a few days afterwards, Walter, bishop of Albano, fetching the pall to the archbishop, on the fourth of the ides of June [10th June], made peace between pope Urban and the king. The king received Anselm into favour, at least apparently. But, a little while after, the king, returning victorious from Wales, breaking out into fresh rage, was incensed against him on account of some inefficient and worthless soldiers, whom some spiteful persons had alleged that Anselm had furnished for the expedition. Wherefore Anselm, believing that such accusations might arise at any time, requested permission from the king, who was then at Windsor, to go to Rome to consult the see of St. Peter touching those matters that he was revolving in his mind; but the king would not give him leave. And so, quitting the court, he came to Canterbury, making no secret of the tidings he brought back. As archbishop Anselm was going on board at Dover, William de Warwast, a very intimate companion of the king, made a strict examination of all his luggage, with the hope of getting money; but finding nothing that he expected, he suffered him and his friends to depart. But the archbishop neither uttered a word of bitterness, nor showed him any mark of disrespect. When Anselm had crossed the sea, the king immediately gave orders that all that belonged to him from the time he entered upon the archbishopric of Canterbury should be transferred to his own possession, and that all the decrees that had been made by him since he became archbishop should be annulled.

On his arrival at Rome he was received by pope Urban with the greatest distinction: and he afterwards went with the pope to the council of Bari, which the same pope was to hold there on the kalends of October [1st Oct.]; and there Anselm confuted the error of the Greeks, who denied that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father and the Son. Afterwards another council was held by the same pope at Rome, at which he was present, in the third week of Easter, and at which the pope excommunicated all laymen that gave investitures of churches, and those who accepted them from such, and in like manner such as, after they had obtained the dignity, presumed to bestow the gift of consecration. When the council broke up the archbishop returned to Lyons in the third year of his banishment. King William died, and was succeeded by his brother Henry, who immediately recalled the archbishop, and granted him permission to dispose freely of his property. But when they began to deliberate in council respecting the churches that had become vacant since the beginning of his exile, the nobles of the realm contended that the investiture of churches appertained to the king. The archbishop held the contrary; and he cited the statutes of the foresaid council. At this the king was incensed, and for two years and a half gave him a great deal of trouble. At last, in order to soften the king's resentment a little, he asked and obtained his consent that he should go to Rome along with the king's envoys, and transact with them those affairs of the realm that would not bear hard upon the liberty of the church. To Rome, then, he went, taking with him William, bishop elect of Winchester, and the deposed abbots Richard of Ely and Aldwin of Ramsey. On their arrival at Rome they find that Urban has been succeeded by Paschal; who, when he had heard of their arrival, and had taken knowledge of their cause, refused to concede to king Henry either the investiture of churches, or anything else that would be displeasing to God. It happened, too, that Anselm said many things against the king, in which he expected that Richard would have supported him. But as Richard was acting for the king, he repelled all the archbishop's charges. And as the report of this affair reached England before him, it recovered the king's favour for him in the fullest measure. When he was on his way back, having failed in the object of his journey, and was making a short stay at Lyons, the foresaid William de Warwast, one of the envoys of our lord [the king], on the part of his master forbade the archbishop to return to England, unless he were willing to annul the statutes of the aforesaid Council, and to observe in every respect the custom that had been introduced of old. He stayed, therefore, at Lyons; and the king soon afterwards took the archbishopric into his own hands. After his property had been confiscated a second time a year and a half passed away: then, at the king's request, he came into Normandy. And when they met together at Bec, the king declared, in the audience of persons of distinction, that he would thenceforth claim no right, either for himself or his heirs, in the investiture of churches; nor would he demand any other right in elections than that of giving his bare assent, as the decision of the canons prescribes. Matters having been in this way accommodated, Anselm returned to England. But before the king and the archbishop had been reconciled, pope Paschal wrote a railing letter [to Gerard¹ archbishop of York] for having sided with the king against archbishop Anselm; and another letter commanding him to make his profession to the same, as his predecessors had done to the predecessors [of the province of Canterbury]. And archbishop Anselm, together with all the bishops of England, held a council in London in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and two, and there degraded several abbots, as well Englishmen as Franks, who had conducted themselves improperly, namely, the abbots of Pershore, Tavistock, Ramsey, Peterborough, Cerne, and Middleton. He also forbade presbyters to marry. And because king Henry had, on the day of his consecration, given the abbey of St. Edmund to the son of Hugh, earl of Chester, a monk of St. Evroul, in spite of the monks of St. Edmund; and because the said Robert had presumed to accept that abbey, without being elected, contrary to the privileges of the monastery, he was degraded in the said council by the said Anselm: and Robert, prior of the monastery, a man of distinguished piety, obtained the abbey; but he died four years afterwards, and was succeeded by Alebold, prior of St. Nicasius of Mellent, who survived for more than four years, who was succeeded by a nephew of Anselm, who died twenty-six years afterwards, in the time of king Stephen, on the day before the kalends of August [31st July]. At a great council held in London the king granted and decreed that thenceforward no one should ever receive investiture in England of an abbacy or bishopric by pastoral staff or ring, either through the king or through the hand of a layman: and, on the other hand, Anselm conceded, that no one that was elected to the prelacy should be deprived of consecration to the dignity conferred upon him out of consideration of the homage which he was to do to the king. Archbishop Gerard also promised, at the same time, for himself and his successors, that he would yield that subjection and obedience to him and his successors, which the bishop of Hereford had promised him at his consecration.

Archbishop Anselm died in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and nine, after he had sat for sixteen years. The see of the archbishopric was vacant after his death for five years.

RALPH, previously bishop of Rochester, was elected at Windsor on the sixth of the kalends of May [26th April], and on the fifth of the kalends of July [27th June] he received the pall from Anselm, legate of our lord the pope: and on the same day he consecrated Theolph bishop of Worcester at Canterbury. He died after he had sat for eight years and six months; and the see was vacant after his decease for four months. This Ralph consecrated Adela as queen of England, at Windsor.

WILLIAM DE TURBINE¹, prior of St. Ositha of Chich, was elected at Gloucester on the Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, [2d Feb.], and was consecrated at Canterbury by William, bishop of Winchester, (acting for the bishop of London, because Richard, bishop of London, was afflicted with paralysis,) on the 14th of the kalends of March [16th Feb.]. Archbishop William went then to Rome to receive the pall, taking with him Thurstan, archbishop of York, and Bernard of St. David's, who received the pall from pope Calixtus. On his return to England he consecrated two bishops, those of Lincoln and Bath; and he gave to his archdeacon the bishopric of Rochester. This William convened a council at Westminster, at which Thurstan, archbishop of York, by letter and messengers, sufficiently accounted for his inability to be present. He dedicated the church of the Holy Trinity at Canterbury in the presence of king Henry. This William consecrated Stephen, the nephew of king Henry, as king, although he had been the first to promise Matilda, daughter of the aforesaid king Henry, that her son Henry the second should be crowned king after Henry the first. We have treated of this above. Archbishop William died after he had sat for thirteen years and nine months. The see was vacant after his death for two years, one month, and thirteen days.

THEOBALD, abbot of Bec, a man of learning and gentle birth, was elected by the bishops, and was consecrated by Alberic, bishop of Ostia and legate of the apostolic see; and, going to Rome, he received the pall from pope Innocent the second at a council held at Rome. But when, subsequently, he attended without king Stephen's leave a council held by pope Eugenius at Reims, he was stripped of all his property. And yet, afterwards, through his mediation, king Stephen and Henry, duke of Normandy, who afterwards became king of England, were reconciled, after being bitter enemies to each other. He died, after he had sat for twenty-two years and four months, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and sixty-one, and the see was vacant for one year and sixteen days. He also consecrated Henry, son of the empress Matilda, as king of England.

THOMAS, the king's chancellor, archdeacon of Canterbury, provost of Beverley, canon of several churches in England, was unanimously elected, on the Wednesday before Whitsunday, by all the clergy of the province assembled in London, at Westminster, in the presence of Henry, the king's son, and the justices of the realm. And on Whitsunday he was ordained priest in the church of Canterbury by Henry, bishop of Winchester, in the room of the church of London, then vacant, [bishop] Richard the second being then dead. Pope Alexander the third sent him the pall by nuncios despatched to himself. He afterwards sent a messenger into Normandy to the king, resigning the chancellorship, and delivering up the seal; which the king received with concern, because he had been told that the archbishop of Mayence, under the king, in Germany, and of Cologne, under the emperor, in Italy, had claimed the title of chancellor. But when the king returned to England he went to meet him, and was received with a kiss, but not into full favour, as by his altered looks he immediately made manifest to all that were present. When pope Alexander was holding a council at Tours, Thomas, with his suffragans, sat on his right hand at the council. Roger, earl of Clare, having been summoned by the archbishop on the eleventh of the kalends of August [22d July] to do him homage for the castle of Tunbridge, and other things to that castle pertaining, withstood him, telling him that the whole of that property belonged rather to the king, in discharge of military service, than to the archbishop. The archbishop bestowed the vacant church of Heyneford upon Laurence; but William, lord of the town, claiming the right of patronage in the same church, ejected Laurence: whereupon the archbishop excommunicated him: and as he took this step without informing the king, he incurred the sovereign's utmost displeasure. For the king declared, according to the dignity of his crown, that no captain, no soldier in the king's service, no servant of the king, no one, to speak in common parlance, who held in capite of the king a castle, town, or estate in land, should in anywise be excommunicated without the king's privity; lest, in case of his receiving no intimation of the fact, he should, unwittingly, have dealings with an excommunicated person, by inviting his tenant in capite to kiss him when come to pay him his respects, or by receiving him when he came to tender his advice. Wherefore the king despatched envoys to our lord the pope, to request him to confirm the customs of the realm; but he did not succeed, owing to the archbishop's opposition.

In the year one thousand one hundred and sixty-four the king convoked a council at Clarendon, on the eighth of the kalends of February [25th Jan.], where he prevailed upon the prelates to confirm the customs of the realm by the authority and written declarations of the archbishops and bishops. This matter was communicated to the pope by Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, who at the same time prayed that he might be absolved from the obligation which he had incurred, and obtained his request. Wishing, too, as he gave out, to punish wrong-doers with due severity, and that the dignity of the priestly order should be subjected to the examination of a fitting tribunal, he decreed that clerks, taken by the justiciaries in the commission of any public offence, should be handed over to the bishop of the diocese, so that if he found a clerk guilty, he should be exempt from the proceedings of the justiciary, and protected from lay proceedings, otherwise he would be tried twice over upon the same charge.¹

This dispute was occasioned by Philip de Broc, canon of Bedford, who, on being brought before the court on a charge of homicide, assailed the king's justiciary in abusive language; and as he was unable to deny this before the archbishop, he was deprived of his prebend, and banished the kingdom for two years. Then the archbishop, unknown to the king, took ship, intending to proceed to Rome, and by so doing he incensed the king more than ever. But the wind proved adverse, and he was cast upon the English coast.

At length, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and sixty-five, the archbishop was brought to trial touching a transaction in which he had been concerned in chancery; and he made his appearance at Northampton on the third of the ides of October [13th Oct.]. For those who were assembled had resolved that he must render an account of everything, beginning from the very first, although before his consecration he had been free and exempt from all responsibility to the will and command of the king. But when this could not be proved, he appealed against the bishops, lest they should condemn him by an unjust sentence; and they made a counter appeal. But the peers of the realm contrived to obtain a sentence against him, although he had neither pleaded guilty, nor was convicted, but stood upon his own privilege and that of the Church. And thus the archbishop, placed in a strait, made the butt of many insulting and reviling taunts, and deprived of the advice of the bishops, raising aloft the cross which he held in his hand, rushed out of the court. The next night he left the town secretly, and then, shunning the public eye by day, and pursuing his journey by night, a few days after he reached the port of Sandwich, whence he was carried in a frail bark to Flanders. For our lord the king had, on his part, immediately despatched many bishops and earls to Sens, to our lord the pope, but they were unable to give effect to his wishes or intentions. But after he had stopped for several days at Pontigny, departing thence, he arrived suddenly at Vezelay. And on Ascension-day, mounting the pulpit, he, with lighted candles, excommunicated the observers, maintainers, and propagators of the aforesaid customs, namely, Richard de Lucy, Richard, archdeacon of Poitiers, Jocelin de Bailliul, Alan de Neville, and many others. They being absent, and not summoned, and undefended, as they gave out, sent messengers to the archbishop, and appealed, and entered the church. They were afterwards absolved by Godfrid, bishop of St. Asaph, by order of the cardinals John of Naples and William of Pavia. Alan was absolved by the bishop of London, having previously made oath that on his way to Jerusalem he would pay his respects to our lord the pope, and abide by his commands. But the above-named cardinals, being sent a latere by the pope, convened the king and the archbishop at Montmirail; and though the archbishop was aware that they were rather disposed to take the king's part, he nevertheless consented that the matter should be brought forward in a judicial form before them as they sat in public; that, according to ecclesiastical order, restitution should first be made, as well to himself as to his friends. For, as he had been robbed, he did not choose to submit to a trial; and there were no means of compelling him thereto. And as they had neither the inclination nor the power to do this, they returned to court, without accomplishing what they had come for. Meanwhile Louis, king of France, provided for his expenses for four years.

In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and sixty-eight, archbishop Thomas excommunicated Alan de Neville, because he had put William, the archbishop's chaplain, in irons. And in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and sixty-nine he excommunicated Gilbert, bishop of London, and wrote to the dean, and archdeacon, and chapter of London, not to hold any communication with him. But afterwards two legates—Vivian and Gratian—were sent to Baieux, to effect a reconciliation; one of whom strove, by all means, to uphold the cause of the archbishop, the other the cause of the king. But as Gratian found no grace with his majesty, so neither did Vivian vivify the memory of the archbishop. And so they withdrew, without accomplishing their purpose, from the court of the king, who was at Baieux. However, at the instance of the king of France, the archbishop wrote to the king of England, praying that he would receive him into favour. And so the king of England and the archbishop would have been united in some sort of harmony had not the king refused with an oath to give the archbishop a kiss in sign of peace; although he was ready to offer, ready to yield, every other security, according to the wish of that worthy person. But in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy, Roger, archbishop of York, contrary to the express injunctions that he had received, crowned Henry, the king's son. Afterwards a conference was held at Montmirail between the king and the archbishop, at which were present the king of France, and Bernard de Corilo, and the prior of Mont-Dieu. After much had passed, they came to the kiss: for the archbishop said, "I kiss you, in honour of God:"

the king recoiled from a kiss that betokened a condition. For the king was perpetually finding fault with certain phrases in the talk of the archbishop, whose conscience was pure; for example, at one time with the words "saving my order," at another, "saving the honour of God," at another, "saving faith to God." But at Ambazium [Amboise] both were brought to a clear understanding; and, through the pacific intervention of Rothrod, archbishop of Rouen, the king and the archbishop were made friends on St. Mary Magdalene's day [22d July]. And thus assured he returned to England, and landed at Sandwich on the kalends of November [1st Nov.], in the seventh year of his exile. The king wrote to his son Henry, informing him that peace had been made, to his own content, between himself and the archbishop, and desiring that he and his friends should also make peace with him.

Now, when Roger, archbishop of York, and Gilbert of London, and Jocelin of Salisbury, had arrived at Dover, and were waiting for a fair wind to cross the sea, lo! on the eve of St. Andrew the Apostle [29th Nov.], there suddenly arrived a nuncio from our lord the pope, bearing to each of these three a letter severally, in which they are smitten with the rod of Interdict and Suspension! But when the archbishop had sailed over, Reginald de Warren, and Gervase de Cormell, sheriff of Kent, and Ralph de Brocs, and many more armed men, hurried to the ship to lay violent hands upon those that had just arrived. But John, dean of Salisbury, who had been sent with the archbishop by the king's command, advanced against them, forbidding them in the king's name to do them any harm, because this would be for the king himself to incur the mark of perdition. But when he arrived at the church of Canterbury, and was received there with great respect by the clergy and people, the functionaries of the new king came to him, commanding him, in the king's name, to absolve them from suspension and excommunication. In answer to this he told them, that if the bishops of London and Salisbury would swear, as in the face of the church, that they would obey his orders, he would absolve them, out of regard to the peace of the church, and out of respect to the king. When this was referred to the bishops, they replied that they could not take such an oath without the king's permission. All this the archbishop immediately reported to the supreme pontiff. But when the archbishop was on his way to Woodstock, to pay his respects to the new king, he was respectfully received by the Londoners, and while they were hospitably entertaining him at Southwark, messengers came to him from the new king, on the fifteenth of the kalends of January [18th Dec.], forbidding him, in the king's name, to proceed to visit him, and commanding him to return to his own church. Accordingly he returned to Canterbury. On Christmas-day he ascended the pulpit to preach to the people; and when the sermon was over, and after the usual prayers to God for the pope, for the king, for peace, and for the public weal, with lighted candles he solemnly excommunicated Nigel de Satbeville, a violent oppressor of the church of Herges, and the vicar of the same church; also Robert de Broks, who, for the purpose of affronting him, had cropped the ears and docked the tail of one of the archbishop's horses that was carrying provisions.

On the day after the festival of the Holy Innocents [29th Dec.], about eventide, while he was sitting with his clergy in his chamber, William de Tracy, Reginald Fitz Urse, Hugh de Morville, and Richard Brito, who had come from Normandy, suddenly broke into his chamber, commanding him, in the king's name, who was then passing his time in Normandy, to restore the bishops that had been suspended from their functions, and to absolve those that had been excommunicated. He answered, that it was no part of an inferior judge to annul the sentence of a superior; and that it was not lawful for any one to set aside that which the apostolic see had decreed:—but, nevertheless, if the bishops of London and Salisbury would swear that they would obey his commands, he would absolve them, out of regard for peace, and out of respect to our lord the king. They then rushed out, on fire with rage. But the archbishop, with his clergy, entered the church for the purpose of chanting vespers. In the meanwhile these four, having put on military accoutrements, were tracking the archbishop's footsteps, and pushing irreverently into the church, began to cry out, "Where is the traitor? Where is the traitor? Where is the archbishop?" When he heard the archbishop's name, he went to meet them from the third step of the presbytery, to which he had just ascended: "If ye seek the archbishop, lo, here I am!" In answer to their most bitter proposals he said, "I am prepared to die; for I prefer to maintain justice, and the liberties of the church, to life itself. I only ask, that my friends may not be exposed to punishment, as they have not been imitators of my fault." On receiving from them his mortal wound in that part of his body—the crown of his head—which the effusion of holy oil had consecrated to the Lord, he bowed his head at the blow, and died, after he had held the see for eight years, six months, and twenty-eight days. The see was vacant for one year, six months, and four days. In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-one, about Easter, the miracles of St. Thomas began to shine forth. By reason of this atrocious deed no divine service was performed in the church of Canterbury for a year, with the exception of nine days. But on the festival of St. Thomas the Apostle [21st Dec.], in obedience to the command of the supreme pontiff, the church was restored to its pristine condition by the suffragans of the same church. On the kalends of September [1st Sept.], at a convocation of the clergy, at Windsor, the subject of the church of Canterbury was taken into consideration; but something or other occurred to cause the matter to be dropped for awhile. But afterwards, on the sixth of the nones of March [2d March], they assembled at Lambeth, and unanimously chose Roger, abbot of Bec. But when the abbot heard of his election he absolutely declined it.

RICHARD, previously prior of Dover, was elected in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-one, by the bishops of England, on the day before the nones of June [4th June], at Westminster, in the chapel of St. Catherine; the monks of Canterbury wishing to have Odo, their prior. On the same day was read a letter from the supreme pontiff respecting the canonization of St. Thomas. But when he had arrived at Canterbury, on the sixth of the ides of June [8th June], so as to be consecrated there on the following day, a letter was despatched by the king's son, setting forth that, without his knowledge and consent, no elections or consecrations could take place in the realm. And thus the consecrations of the archbishop and others, namely, the bishops elect of Winchester, Bath, Ely, and Lincoln, being put off, they all returned home; although they should not have done so without the permission of king Henry his father. But in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-three, Richard, the bishop elect of Canterbury, taking with him for a companion the bishop elect of Winchester, went to Rome. When he arrived there his election of the sixth of the nones of April [2d April] was confirmed by the supreme pontiff, and he was consecrated by him at Anagni.

He returned to England in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-four, and reached London on the third of the nones of September [3d Sept.]; but he had only just arrived when his church at Canterbury was burnt, on the nones of September [5th Sept.]: nevertheless he consecrated the fore-mentioned bishops elect at Canterbury, on the third of the nones of October [5th Oct.]. He afterwards visited the church of Waltham, and suspended Guy, the dean of that place. And then, going to Gloucester, he frightened the clerks of St. Oswald, by rebuking them sharply for their insubordination in saying that they were exempt from his jurisdiction. At this, Roger, archbishop of York, was so deeply offended, that he appealed against him by messengers despatched to the apostolic see.

In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-five, the archbishop of Canterbury convened a council in London, at Westminster, on the fifteenth of the kalends of June [18th May], at which was read a letter of king Henry the father, concerning the reconciliation that had been effected between himself and his son. But Roger of York was not present; neither did he send any one to apologize for his absence. And because the diocese of Canterbury had only one archidiaconate from the time of the old fathers, he instituted three archdeacons there.

In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight, a controversy of long standing between the archbishop of Canterbury and the abbot of St. Augustine was brought to a close by pope Alexander on these terms:—that the archbishop of Canterbury should bestow his blessing upon him and his successors in the monastery of St. Augustine, without exacting obedience. But in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and seventy-nine, the abbot of that place received from the same pope the mitre, gloves, and ring, at Tusculum, in sign of emancipation granted.

In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and eighty-four, the archbishop of Canterbury died, on the thirteenth of the kalends of March [17th Feb.], at Halling, a vill belonging to the bishop of Rochester, after he had sat for nine years, and forty-five weeks, and five days, from his enthronization, or consecration. The see was vacant for one year.

BALDWIN, previously bishop of Worcester, and a monk of Chichester, was elected in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and eighty-four, with the assent of the suffragans, and also of the monks of Canterbury, at Westminster, on the Third Sunday in Advent [18th Dec.]. Pope Lucius sent him the pall. He was enthroned in his see on the festival of St. Dunstan [19th May], in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and eighty-six. Moreover, he was received with a solemn procession at St. Augustine's; and the intimacy between the churches of Canterbury, which had been dead for many a day, revived. Pope Urban granted him a legatine office, that he might act in his stead, as a legate sent by him through all the churches of the diocese of Canterbury. Conrad, the son of the Marquis,¹ wrote to him in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and eighty-nine, to request that he would have compassion upon the land of Jerusalem, by moving the people to an inclination to succour that country, which was now delivered into the hands of the pagans. He also consecrated Richard as king of England, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and ninety. The archbishop just mentioned set out for the Holy Land at the time when king Richard was commencing his journey thither, and he appointed Richard, bishop of London, to act in his stead, with the common advice of his suffragans. He was accompanied by Hubert, bishop of Salisbury, and Ranulph de Glanvil, at one time justiciary of the realm of England. Designing to proceed by a direct course to Jerusalem, they passed Sicily on their left hand, and after many perils landed at Cyprus, about the Feast of St. Michael [29th Sept.]. But while he was there he breathed his last at Acre. He appointed Hubert of Salisbury executor of his last will and testament. And so he died, after he had sat for six years, and six months, and seventeen days. And the see was vacant for three years, all but sixteen days.

HUBERT WAUTER, previously bishop of Salisbury, was elected with the assent of the suffragans and also of the monks of Canterbury, at Westminster, on the thirtieth of May. Pope Celestine sent him the pall by one named Episcopellus. He was solemnly enthroned on the nones of November [5th Nov.]. This Hubert, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and ninety-five, obtained from the same Celestine plenitude of power in the office of legate, with the unanimous consent of all the cardinals, as well in the bishopric of York as in his own;—an honour which had not been conferred upon his predecessor Baldwin. He also consecrated John as king of England. He died in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and five, after he had sat for twelve years; and the see was vacant for three years.

STEPHEN LANGTON a cardinal priest of the Roman church, with the title of St. Crisogonus, received the pall from pope Innocent the third in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and eight. In his time England was laid under an Interdict in the time of king John. But when the monks of Canterbury, without the consent of the suffragan bishops of the church of Canterbury, first chose their prior; and the same suffragans chose the bishop of Norwich, John the second of that name, without the consent of the monks; the cause was at length referred to the apostolic see, and they then unanimously chose the aforesaid Stephen, a cardinal, and native of England. And, thereupon, the pope wrote to desire John king of England to receive him, otherwise he would smite his land with an Interdict. And this took place; and there was in the same year—one thousand two hundred and eight—a general Interdict in England, which continued till the year one thousand two hundred and thirteen, in which the archbishop came, with a legate, to England. The said pope likewise granted to the monks of Canterbury that they might thenceforward choose an archbishop without the suffragans of the same church. In the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and twenty-two he held a council at Oxford in the time of king Henry, son of John, where a certain deacon was burnt to death; and a certain countryman who had crucified himself. He died after he had sat for twenty-one years.

RICHARD THE SECOND, called Master Grant, was consecrated on the fourth of the ides of June [10th June], in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and thirty-four. He died when he had sat for two years, and the see was vacant for two years.

EDMUND OF ABINGDON was consecrated archbishop in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and thirty-four. He was a man of eminent sanctity. But in consequence of a sad dissension that arose between him and king Henry respecting the rights and liberties of the church of Canterbury, and his monks taking opposite sides, after intolerable injuries, at a council of his suffragans held on this matter, he excommunicated those who had unjustly intruded, and those who had jeopardized the rights and liberties of the church of Canterbury generally; and some, of whose guilt he had legal evidence, specially. But being unwilling to break with the king, and, still more, to yield to evildoers, he crossed over to the continent. He died there after he had sat for six years, and reposes at Pontigny, in the year of our Lord one thousand two hundred and forty.

ANNALS OF THE CHURCH OF WINCHESTER.

ANNALS OF THE CHURCH OF WINCHESTER,

FROM THE YEAR 633 TO THE YEAR 1277.

BY A MONK OF WINCHESTER.

IN the year six hundred and thirty-three, Kinegils, son of Celric, became king of the West Saxons. St. Birin, the bishop, baptized him. By the same Birin, Kinewalch, son of Kinegils, was baptized : and all the Saxons of the same kingdom, having embraced the faith, were likewise baptized. He gave to St. Birin the city of Dorchester, that he might reside there, until he could build in the royal city a church worthy of so distinguished a prelate ; for it was his intention to erect a temple of the first rank in Winchester ; and, as soon as he had collected a vast number of building materials for the work, he determined to make over, as a gift, for the erection of a church, the whole of the land around Winchester, extending every way thence, as from a centre, with a radius of seven leagues. But because he was prevented from accomplishing his design by a disorder that threatened to be fatal, he deputed the task to other hands ; and, having summoned his son Kinewalch to his presence, he made him pledge his soul, before St. Birin, that he would build in Winchester a church worthy of the episcopal see, and that he would on his part offer to God, for the work of his ministry, and make over for ever, that circuit of land, which he had himself marked out for the same church.

In the year six hundred and thirty-nine, Kinewalch, son of Kinegils. He, after the disquiet which Penda, king of the Mercians, had occasioned him by repudiating his daughter, built a very beautiful church in Winchester, and made over and confirmed all the land which his father had solemnly promised to the church. But Agilbert, bishop of Dorchester, who succeeded Birin, having refused to comply with the king's wish to transfer the see to Winchester, the king, who was but slenderly acquainted with Agilbert's language—who was a native of Gaul—seizing an opportunity that presented itself, caused a certain Saxon, named Wine, to be consecrated bishop of the new see ; and thus the diocese was divided into two. King Kinewalch, after giving effect to his father's offering of Chiltecumb, went on to enrich the church of Winchester with gifts of his own, and conferred upon it three manors, that is to say, Dunton, Alresford, and Wordia, and he was buried in it.

In the year six hundred and seventy, Escuin, a kinsman of Kinegils, king of the West Saxons : he was buried at Winchester.

In the year six hundred and seventy-two, Centuin (an adopted son of Kinegils), king of the West Saxons, was buried at Winchester.

In the year six hundred and eighty-three, Ina, king of the West Saxons. He gave to the church of Winchester, in the island Vecta, which is now called Wight, in a place named Ewerland, thirty hides of land, and in Bresding fifty hides.

In the year seven hundred and twenty-one, Ethelard, king of the West Saxons. His consort, queen Fritheswitha, gave to the church of Winchester, out of her own patrimony, Taunton. And Ethelard himself, on his part, added to the manor aforesaid seven manses for the building of the church.

In the year seven hundred and thirty-five, Cutred, a kinsman of Ethelard, became king of the West Saxons. He gave to the church of Winchester, at Muleburna, in the Isle of Wight, forty hides, and at Banewade twenty-five hides, and at Witthingeba twenty-two hides, and the land called Druce, and the manor called Clere.

In the year eight hundred, Egbert became king of the West Saxons. He, on obtaining the sovereignty of the whole island, did not forget to return thanks to God for the honour that had been conferred upon him; and he gave to God and to the church of Winchester thirty hides at Cawelburne, in the Isle of Wight; and at Scaldeblote forty-two hides and four towns, namely, Droke-nesford, Wordia, Aweltone, and Beddintone. He was buried in the church of Winchester.

In the year eight hundred and thirty-seven, Eadulf, son of Egbert, became king of England. He had been subdeacon¹ in the church of Winchester; and, as king Egbert had no other heir, he was taken, or, I should rather say, taken back, from clerical order to the kingdom; the pope granting him a dispensation. He tithed the whole land of his dominions, and assigned every tenth hide to the conventual churches throughout the district; and hence it came to pass that he restored to the church of Winchester the entire land of Chiltecumb, as tithe for the one sole hide, which the kings Kinegils and Kinewach had previously given, but which, between his time and their's, had been alienated from the church. The same king Eadulf also gave to the same church of Winchester, for an augmentation of Taunton, a hundred and forty-three hides of land; and he made over two manors—Brichtwelle and Wemberge—to the same church, in which also he was buried.

In the year eight hundred and seventy-two, Elured, son of Eadulf, became king of England. He erected, at Winchester, in the burial-ground of the episcopal church, a new monastery, which, endowed with considerable property, he gave to St. Grimbald, with a view to detain him in England. The whole kingdom of England, which before his time had been rude and uncivilized, he instructed and brought into order. He was so distinguished for his proverbs, that no one could afterwards compete with him. King Elured was buried in the new monastery at Winchester. This Elured gave, by way of augmentation, to Taunton, the town which is called Rirc-tune, for the work of the church of Winchester.

In the year nine hundred and one, Edward, son of Elured, became king of England. St. Edburga was his daughter, whose sacred body really reposes in Winchester, at Nunnemenstre; although the monks of Malvern falsely boast that they possess it. He gave to the church of Winchester four manors,—Husseburne, Whitchurch, Owertone, and one of the places called Stoke. He also gave many farms to the new monastery which his father built at Winchester, in which he lies buried.

In the year nine hundred and twenty-four, Edelstan, son of Edward, became king of England. He gave to the church of Winchester the head of Justus the Martyr, and three manors—Chilbeldinte, Enedford, and Eismeresworde. He also conferred many favours upon the monastery of Malmesbury, in which he was buried.

In the year nine hundred and forty-six, Edred, the brother of Edmund, became king of England. His body is buried at Winchester, to which, while yet alive, he restored two manors that had been for a long time alienated, that is to say,—Dunton and Hesseburn.

In the year nine hundred and fifty-nine, Edgar, the brother of Edwy, and son of Edmund, became king of England. There was not a monastery or church in England whose worship, or structure, he did not improve. In the church of Winchester, and in the new monastery, which, from the circumstance, is now called the monastery of Hyde; he placed monks in the room of clerks; because those clerks, nominally canonical, leaving to their substitutes, (maintained no matter how,) the duty of attendance in the choir, the labour of watching, and the ministry of the altar, and often absenting themselves for seven years from the sight of the church, not to say of God, spent, where and as they thought proper, whatever they received from their prebends. The church was stripped bare within and without; for the substitutes had not wherewithal to clothe or to roof it; and the aforesaid prebendaries could not attend to such matters. Scarcely could one be found, and he, perhaps, only on compulsion, who would bestow upon the altar a sorry pall, or a chalice worth five shillings. King Edgar, taking these things into consideration, and grieving that the rich alms that had been bestowed upon the church should neither be spent upon it, nor upon the church's ministers, nor upon the poor, sent to these boasters, and frequently took order with Athelwold their bishop, and with archbishop Dunstan, that those who pocketed the property of the church for a given purpose should be obliged to give constant attendance in the church. But when the canons turned a deaf ear to the commands and warnings of the king, and individually refused to suffer themselves to be confined within the cloister for even an annual rental which amounted to one thousand pounds of gold, the king, adhering to his resolution, and wishing to have the services of religion performed rather by canons than by a class of a stricter religion, deprived some of them of their prebends, and bestowed them upon those substitutes whom he had observed to be constant in their attendance at church. But they, too, now advanced to the post of canons, appointing substitutes for themselves, became as bad as the former, aye, and more fond of gadding, and more worldly minded than they. Accordingly, the king, having entirely failed in his efforts to effect a reformation of the canons, after he had caused them to break their fast, turned them out of the church and the new monastery, and placed monks in their room, having obtained from pope John the thirteenth, the ratification and confirmation of the dispersion of the one party and the assembling together of the other. Having settled matters in this way, king Edgar enriched the new monastery with property, and bestowed upon the church of Winchester the manor called Awinton, and ten hides at Itinstoke, three hides at Madanlege, thirteen hides at Breondune, two hides at Aderingefelde, and seven hides at Thuca.¹

King Edgar had two sons,—Edward, by his lawful queen; and Ethelred, by the widowed daughter of earl Ethelwold: this Ethelwold had given to the church of Winchester the vill which is called the vill of Wilith, whom the king had transfixured with a spear, in the forest of Werewell, on account of his beautiful wife.

In the year nine hundred and seventy-nine, Ethelred, the brother of Edward the Martyr, became king of England. He gave to the church of Winchester Hawnta and Sudtune, and a hide-and-a-half in a place called Celseshord, and two fisheries at Brendeford, with one virgate of land, and at Ginnahetchte with the land adjoining; and he restored Dunton, which had been twice alienated.

In one thousand and thirty-five, King Cnut gave to the church of Winchester three hides of land, called Hille, and a shrine for the relicks of St. Birin, and a candlestick of silver with six branches, such as we see in these times in churches, made of valuable bronze, and two bells. He was buried in the same church.

In the year one thousand and forty-two, King Hardicanute died at Lambeth, cut off by a sudden death, and he was buried in the episcopal church at Winchester. In the time of king Hardicanute, queen Emma lodged at Winchester, and was on very friendly terms with Elwin, then bishop of the city of Winchester; all powerful in the kingdom, abounding in wealth, her affections were centered in her son, who occupied the throne; and her attention was engrossed by the bishop, for whom she had a great regard. Some persons conveyed intelligence to Edward, in Normandy, touching his mother's suspected familiarity with the bishop; affirming that it was chiefly owing to the bishop, that the mother shed no tears for the death of one of her² sons, and kept the other out of sight. Queen Emma, Hardicanute's mother, gave to the church of Winchester, for the soul of king Hardicanute, many ornaments of gold and silver, jewels, and costly vestments, and two manors—namely, Westwode and Periperminster; for the queen owned those numerous manors which king Ethelred had given her for a dowry; and kings Canute and Hardicanute had established an hereditary right of assigning them to whatsoever places, and bestowing them upon what persons soever, they thought proper.

In the year one thousand and forty-three, Edward, king of England, son of Ethelred, came in disguise to Winchester, clad in mean attire ; and feasting, at times in his mother's court, at times in the bishop's mansion, but unrecognised, he attentively scrutinized the looks which they exchanged. At last he was recognised, and was elected king, and consecrated at Winchester. He ordained, and confirmed by charter, that as often as he, or any of his successors, kings of England, should carry the crown to Winchester, or Worcester, or Westminster, the precentor of the place should receive from the treasury on that day half a mark, and the convent a hundred simnel cakes and a barrel of wine. This charter is at Westminster. He took to wife Edith the daughter of Godwin, perpetual virginity being preserved by both. He honoured Godwin above all men ; his mother he neither loved, nor discomposed in public. He invited from Normandy certain persons who had been kind to him in his exile ; among whom was Robert, whom he first made bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. This archbishop fretted the mind of king Edward with so many hints and inuendos, that he, though naturally disinclined to harshness, was moved to such a pitch of bitter resentment, that he drove from his kingdom, with his sons, that very earl Godwin, who had made him king, and whose daughter he had espoused. From his mother, queen Emma, he took away all that she possessed in the world, even to the value of a farthing, and, having thrust her into the abbey of Warewell, he caused her to be kept there in the extremity of penury. Alwin, bishop of Winchester, his mother's reported paramour, after stripping him of all his patrimonial property, he forbade, on peril of his life, to set foot beyond the boundary of the city of Winchester. Godwin, with his sons, quitted the kingdom. The episcopal residence of bishop Alwin became his prison. The queen was placed in custody at Warewell, but subject to a confinement less strict than her son had enjoined ; she was permitted to write to all the bishops whom she had believed to be faithful to her, and to set forth her sorrows. Her letters ran in this tenour ;—That she was more afflicted and abashed at the bishop's disgrace than at her own : that she was ready to prove before the tribunal of God, that the unjustly calumniated prelate had never touched her flesh ; and that neither she herself, nor he, had ever done, or wished to do, any thing to the prejudice of the king :—That the bishops ought to seek the presence of the sovereign, and to intercede for their fellow-bishop, and, by every means in their power, persuade him to listen to his mother's justification of herself and of the bishop :—That an upright conscience publicly impeached of crime could not otherwise be purged than by a public release ; and that she chose the ordeal of red-hot iron. Only let them stipulate that, by the king's directions, the ordeal should take place in the church of St. Swithun, at Winchester. She was sure of the suffrage of the saint in confirmation of the testimony of her own conscience. That if they delayed in carrying this matter into effect, her heart would break at the further exposure of her poverty, because the chief and most intolerable curse of poverty consists in this, that it makes men contemptible. That the king would be universally disgraced if he chose rather to punish a parent whose guilt was neither established nor acknowledged, than to accept her clearance from the imputation, for the importance of the accusation increases in proportion to the rank of the individual accused. In these days a mother is persecuted by her son, a queen by a king, who also has put forth his hand against the Lord's anointed.

Each of the bishops, to whom the queen had written, severally gave her his advice in his reply; and, having assembled in the king's presence on a day appointed, they treated with him touching his mother's complaints and supplications. King Edward, a man of singular simplicity and inoffensiveness, who never did wrong unless at the instigation of another, would have suffered himself to be easily won over by the allegations of the bishops, and would have mitigated whatever severity he had used against his mother or the bishop under the misguidance of a groundless suspicion, not only without demanding a clearance by ordeal, but would himself, by begging pardon, have made amends for his presumption in any way that the bishops might have prescribed. This he would have done, had not archbishop Robert, who had been summoned by the king, opposed it; for so high did he stand in the king's estimation, that, if he had said that a black crow was a white one, the king would sooner have believed the archbishop's words than his own eyes. The matter would have been brought to a close on that very day, to the honour of both mother and son, if it had not happened that when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan had not come also among them. Archbishop Robert making himself, unasked, the advocate of the stronger party, endeavoured, in such terms as these, to thwart the intentions of the bishops, and to alienate the king's affection from his mother. "Brethren, ye have had communications with my lord the king, touching the business of his mother—no woman, but a wild beast. But, (that I may spare you,) you fling back the crime of the mother upon the son, not in your own words, but in the words of another. This most shameless of women has had the effrontery to wrong the king by belching forth her defamatory expressions against him; and has dared to call that paramour of hers,—who knows how to put on the vizard of sanctity, who talks of virtue, and plays the adulterer; that man whom no one would scruple to subject to the basest infamy, in order that she may charge the sovereign with sacrilege,—'the Lord's anointed.' Mark the wickedness of the woman. She calls her Elwin 'the Lord's anointed,' only for the purpose of having the king punished for raising his hand against him. But let us come to the matter in hand. The woman wants to clear the bishop's character; but who will clear hers? one who is reported to have consented to the murder of her son Elured, and to have procured poison for Edward? But, grant that she has an authority above her sex's condition because she is queen, if you wish me to consent to a mode of purgation that has hitherto never been heard of, you too must consent that I shall determine what that ordeal is to be. And if she goes through it wholly unhurt, you may condemn me to be stripped of my rank before God, and the king who is on his trial; and may reinstate in their former rank those who shall be acquitted. The entire guilt of the king, whom I presume to be innocent, I will take upon myself. Let that infamous woman take for herself four, for the bishop five, that is nine steps, without stopping, upon nine burning hot ploughshares with naked feet. If she stumble, if she does not press with the entire sole of her foot each of the ploughshares, if she be hurt, even in the slightest degree, let sentence be passed against her as an adulteress and a strumpet. Let each of them, having taken the vows of the strictest order, be imprisoned for life in a dungeon. And you must admit that this sentence is the result rather of tenderness than severity, which, I will not say decrees, but, endures, that a capital crime be purged by an ordeal of this peculiar character." The king and the bishops seemed to approve of the archbishop's sentence; and it was determined to assemble at Winchester on an appointed day.

The sentence was reported to the queen, who was not more discomposed at it than if she had been invited to a bridal. The news was spread throughout the kingdom that the queen was to undergo this ordeal; and such was the throng of people that flocked to Winchester, that so vast a concourse on one day was never before seen there. The king himself, St. Edward, came to Winchester; nor did a single noble of the kingdom absent himself, except archbishop Robert, who feigned illness at Dover, in order that, if matters should turn out otherwise than he expected, he might be able to make his escape without difficulty. And so it happened.

The queen was brought back, by the king's orders, from Warewell to Winchester; and during the whole night that preceded the day of her conflict, she kept watch at the tomb of St. Swithun. I need not say that she prayed with her whole heart, that during the night she had but little sleep, that she implored that in a danger so dreadful she might be thought worthy of being delivered. And yet, though she tried to keep awake, she slept a little, and saw St. Swithun standing by her, and heard him addressing her in these words:—"Be stedfast, my daughter; I am Swithun, whom thou invokest; I am with thee; fear not. They that persecute thee shall be confounded; because when thou passest through the fire, the flame shall not hurt thee. But thou shalt transfer this evil to thy son." As soon as it was day the clergy and populace assembled at the church; the king himself took his seat in front of the throne. The queen was led forth before her son; and, on being asked whether she was willing to go through what she had undertaken, she signified her assent in these words:—

"My lord and son, I am that Emma who gave thee birth; in thy presence impeached by thy subjects of guilt against thee and Elured, my children, and of being an accomplice in having wrought uncleanness and treason with the bishop of this church, I this day call upon God to bear witness against my body by destroying it, if I have committed, even in thought, any of those crimes that have been laid to my charge." The pavement of the church having been swept, there were placed upon it nine red-hot ploughshares,¹ over which a short prayer was said, and then the queen's shoes and stockings were drawn off, and laying aside her mantle, and pulling off her veil, with her garments girded closely about her, between two bishops, one on either hand, she was conducted to the torture. The bishops, that led her, wept, and, though they were more terrified than she was, they encouraged her not to be afraid. All persons who were within the church wept; and there was a general exclamation, "O St. Swithun, St. Swithun, help her!" If at this moment there had been a peal of thunder, the people would not have heard it; with such might, with such shouts, did they rend the firmament, that St. Swithun must, then or never, have hastened to the rescue. God suffers violence, and his servant, St. Swithun, is forcibly pulled down from the skies. All was hushed, and the queen uttered this prayer, "God, who didst deliver Susanna from the wicked elders, and who didst deliver the three children from the fiery furnace, vouchsafe, for the merits of St. Swithun, to rescue me from the fire that is prepared for me." Behold a miracle! Her feet guided by the bishops, she, making nine steps upon the nine ploughshares, and pressing each of them with the full weight of her whole body, and thus treading upon the nine ploughshares, she felt neither the naked iron nor the fire. Then said she to the bishops, "Shall I not obtain that which I have most desired? Why lead me out of the church, who in the church must undergo the ordeal?" For she was still advancing, and knew not that the ordeal was past. "Where to?" the bishops replied, as well as they could for sobbing; "Look, lady, it is all over! What you think you have still to do is already done." She looked, and her eyes were opened; then she saw the iron for the first time, and perceived the miracle. "Lead me," she said, "to my son, that he may see my feet, and know that I have suffered no harm." The bishops, returning with the queen, found him, with his head uncovered, prostrate upon the ground; and now his voice failed him for pity, for tears mingled with his words, and he could not refrain himself. And when they had lifted him up, and told him the whole matter afresh, that most sacred personage sunk down at his mother's feet, saying, "Mother, I have sinned against heaven and before thee; I am no longer worthy to be called thy son." His mother replied, "Summon to your presence bishop Elwin; and when you have given him satisfaction, you will instantly obtain pardon of me." When the bishop, who had not taken his seat among the bishops, was summoned to the king, the monarch sought forgiveness with tears, and obtained it; and, after being beaten with scourges by each of the bishops, he was smitten thrice by his weeping mother's hand. And thus having kissed each other, the king received them with favour, and they received the king with veneration; and the queen and the bishop recovered all that had been taken from them. By the king's command the nature and order of the miracle was proclaimed by the lamenting throng in the church and in the churchyard without; and so suddenly was their weeping turned into laughter, that you might see them both laughing and crying at the same moment.

Queen Emma, on receiving all the manors of her dowry, which former kings had confirmed to her, was not unmindful of her deliverer; and on that very day she presented to St. Swithun, for the nine ploughshares, nine manors, the names of which are, Bishop Elwin gave, out of his own patrimony, to St. Swithun, nine other manors, named Edward the king himself ratified and confirmed the donations of the queen and of the bishop, and gave in addition, out of his domain, two manors, viz. Meones and Portland,¹ and an estate of five hides, called Wrockeshale.² The queen and the bishop strove to outvie each other in ornamenting the church of St. Swithun out of their own treasures: but he was outdone; either because her ability was greater than his, or because her heart was more set upon the decoration of the house of God.

In the year one thousand and forty-seven, bishop Elwin died, and was succeeded by Stigand, who, out of the gifts of queen Emma, erected a large cross, with two images,—of Mary and John; and gave them, along with the cross-beam, richly attired in gold and silver, to the church of Winchester.

In the year one thousand and fifty-two, queen Emma departed this life, and was buried in the church of St. Swithun, at Winchester.

In the year one thousand and fifty-three, earl Godwin died. Githa, the wife of Godwin, a woman of considerable wealth, bestowed a great sum in alms upon many churches for the benefit of his soul; and gave to the church of Winchester two manors—Bleodone and Eramkumbe, together with ornaments of various sorts.

In the year one thousand and sixty-nine, Aldred, who, from being a monk of Winchester, became bishop of Hereford, and next archbishop of York, publicly excommunicated the king, because he carried himself in the realm contrary to ecclesiastical law. Not long afterwards he passed to rest from this troublesome life.

In the year one thousand and seventy, Peter and John, cardinals, sent by pope Alexander, arrived in England, and, having summoned a council at the pleasure of the king, deposed archbishop Stigand and many other bishops and abbots, with the consent and approbation of king William; and the king gave the archbishopric of Canterbury to Lanfranc, abbot of Caen, the archbishopric of York to Thomas, and the bishopric of Winchester to Walkelin. But in the same year the king seized upon all the gold and silver that were in the churches. Stigand had previously held in his own hands the archbishopric of Canterbury, and the bishopric of Winchester, and many abbeys, making market of the bishoprics and abbeys, securing for himself some of the sacred honours of the churches with money, and selling the rest to others by contract. But I am of opinion that he erred through want of judgment; for he was an illiterate man, and was not aware that he was doing wrong; thinking that matters ecclesiastical ought to be transacted just in the same way as men deal with the affairs of this world. But he never obtained the pall from Rome.

A. D. 1072. In this year Stigand, who had been lately archbishop, was arrested by the king's command, and placed in the town of Winchester, where, though sorely against his will, he made amends for his misdeeds in the archbishopric; for the recollection of what he gave up afflicted him more than its possession had afforded him satisfaction. There at last he died; and he was buried, with due respect, in the church of Winchester, over which he had presided for a short time.¹ The same Stigand had given to the church of Winchester a very large cross, with two images admirably wrought in gold and silver. In the same year, Wulfric, abbot of the new monastery, was degraded, and Rewalan was appointed in his stead.

A. D. 1073. Be it known that king William was wont, every year, while he was at peace, to be crowned thrice—at Worcester at Christmas, at Winchester at Easter, and in London at Whitsuntide.

It has been an ancient custom, and it was made a rule in council by archbishop Lanfranc, that in all councils the archbishop of York should sit on the right hand of the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London on his left, and the bishop of Winchester next to the archbishop of York. If the archbishop of York was not present, then the bishop of London sat on the right hand, the bishop of Winchester on the left; the rest of the bishops in the order of their consecration.

A. D. 1079. Bishop Walkelin began to rebuild the church of Winchester from its foundation.

A. D. 1082. Simeon, a man distinguished for his love of virtue, brother of bishop Walkelin, from being provost of Winchester, (whom we call prior,) was made abbot of Ely; and Godefrid, a monk of the same place, a man of spotless beneficence and piety, was put in his place. How eminent the aforesaid provosts Simeon and Godefrid were for prudence, goodness, and charity, is attested by their gifts which still remain in the church of Winchester. Now the said Simeon was brother of bishop Walkelin, and a monk of St. Ouen: on being made prior of Winchester, when he marked how the monks, in the refectory, constantly ate flesh, he caused an exquisite dish of fish to be cooked, and laid before them; with which they were so delighted, that they requested that such dishes might always be served up to them, and said that they would then gladly abstain from flesh. They were accordingly supplied with fish, and ate no more flesh.

A. D. 1084. Hugh, bishop of London, died; and Arfast, bishop of Norwich. Wulfnod, abbot of Chertsey, prevented by death, demised that abbey to Odo. Alicia succeeded Beatrice in the abbey of the nuns of Winchester.

A. D. 1086. Henry, the king's son, was knighted; and to three of the king's chaplains were three bishoprics given,—London to Maurice, Norwich to William, and Chester to Robert; and to Gerold, a monk of Winchester, was given the abbey of Cranborne, which he transferred to Tewkesbury. Cristina, the king's daughter, a virgin devoted to God, was made a nun at Rumsey. It is said, that the king granted to bishop Walkelin, for the completion of the church of Winchester, which he had commenced, as much timber of the forest of Hanepinges as he could get, with the aid of carpenters, in four days and nights. Having, accordingly, collected a vast number of carpenters, the whole wood was felled within the given time, and carried to Winchester. After this the king came to Hanepinge, and, looking about him, as if bewildered, he exclaimed, "Am I bewitched? or, am I beside myself? Where am I? Had I not here a delightful wood, near Winchester?" As soon as he found out what had been done, he became exasperated. Thereupon Walkelin, snatching up an old cope, demanded of the king's door-keepers admission into the royal chamber; and, falling at his feet, he said, "My lord, I know that you have many clerks and chaplains waiting for preferment; and it is for this reason that you seek occasion against me. Take back, then, if it please you, the bishopric you have given me. Reserve for me, with your friendship, the office which I have long held in your chapel." More need scarcely be added. At last said the king, "In sooth, Walkelin, I have been too lavish a donor; and thou hast been too greedy an acceptor." So then he made his peace with the king, and, friendship being restored, he returned to his bishopric.

A. D. 1087. London, with the church of St. Paul, was burnt to the ground. Stigand, bishop of Chichester, departed this life.

A. D. 1088. Gila, bishop of Wells, died; and was succeeded by John, the king's chaplain and physician, who, after giving a large sum to the king, transferred the see to Bath. Godefrid, bishop of Chichester, died, and [Ralph de Luffa] succeeded him. On the death of Ralph, abbot of Winchester, the king assigned the abbey to Ralph Passeflabere, his chaplain.

A. D. 1089. On the death of Lanfranc, the king entrusted the archbishopric of Canterbury to Ralph Passeflabere; and he gave to the king whatever profits he could thence obtain, that he might bear his promotion in mind.

A. D. 1090. The king carried off a large treasure from the church of Winchester.

A. D. 1091. Ralph obtained the bishopric of Chichester; and Herbert, abbot of Ramsay, obtained the bishopric of Norwich; and William, the bishopric of Durham. The church of Croyland was burnt down.

A. D. 1092. The king entrusted to Ralph Passeflabere the bishopric of Lincoln and the abbey of Chertsey: for abbot Odo resigned it, because he did not like to hold it of the king, after the manner of secular persons. But the aforesaid Ralph, a man who exceeded all others in artful villany, rifled the churches that had been entrusted to him of all their property, and reduced both rich and poor to such a state of penury that they deemed death itself preferable to life under such a tyrant.

A. D. 1093. On the sixth of the ides of April [8th April], in the presence of nearly all the bishops and abbots of England, the monks removed from the old monastery of Winchester to the new one, with the utmost exultation and rejoicing. And on the Feast of St. Swithun [2nd July], having gone in procession from the new monastery to the old one, they carried thence the shrine of St. Swithun, and placed it in the new one with great ceremony. And on the following day, being that of lord Walkelin the bishop, the people commenced pulling down the old monastery; and it was completely razed in that year, except one aisle and the high altar.

A. D. 1094. A violent quarrel occurred between archbishop Thomas,¹ and Robert, elect of Lincoln, because the archbishop affirmed that the bishopric of Lincoln ought to be subject to him, and because he prevented Anselm from consecrating him. Robert afterwards gave the king three thousand marks, to free the bishopric of Lincoln from subjection to the archbishopric of York; and this he did, at the same time giving the archbishop two abbeys, namely, that of Selby and St. Oswald in Gloucester. Some relics of St. Swithun, and of many other saints, are discovered under the altar of the old monastery. Abbot Simeon died.

A. D. 1097. The king, having committed the realm to the care of Walkelin and Ralph Passeflabere, passed over to the continent. Ralph held under his guardianship sixteen churches that were destitute of pastors, bishoprics and abbeys, which he reduced to the lowest state of poverty. Those churches which had pastors over them paid yearly to the king three hundred or four hundred marks, some more, some less. Such was the distress of both clergy and people, that life itself became a burden to them.

A. D. 1098. Bishop Walkelin, of venerable and pious memory, departed to the Lord, whom with his whole heart he had loved. The king had given orders, on the day of the Nativity of our Lord, just after the service of mass had begun, that he should send him, without a moment's delay, two hundred pounds. But he, well knowing that he could not do that upon the instant, without plundering the poor, or rifling the treasury of the church, was rendered weary of life by this and other things of the like sort, and, having offered up a prayer, begged that he might be delivered from his unhappy existence; and this actually took place ten days afterwards. He was indeed a man of blameless piety and sanctity, of boundless wisdom; and of such rigid abstinence, that he ate neither flesh nor fish, and rarely tasted either malt liquor or wine, and then very sparingly. He spent all his time with the monks; and whenever he celebrated mass in his chapel at Winchester, he had monks for his deacon and subdeacon. In short, he loved his convent as much as if they were all gods. He greatly improved the church of Winchester in the solemnity of its divine service, in the number of its monks, and in the structure of its dwellings. At first, indeed, the new-comer felt a dislike to the monks; but he soon overcame this, and often regretted that transient disesteem. Afterwards he cherished them as his children, loved them as his brethren, honoured them as his masters, and at times showed himself both helpful and affable. He never used harsh language to any one, declaring that the episcopal severity would sully his reputation with an unseemly blot, if he were to stoop to the language of reproach towards the poor. One thing occasioned him exceeding pain, namely, that he had deprived the monks of lands to the value of three hundred pounds, which he appropriated to himself and his successors in the bishopric.

A. D. 1099. Ralph was made bishop of Durham. Osmund, bishop of Salisbury, died. The same Osmund caused the church of Salisbury to be built and consecrated.

A. D. 1100. The king was shot through with an arrow, in the New Forest, by Walter Tirel, and was buried in the church of St. Swithun at Winchester. His brother Henry was consecrated king, in London, by Maurice, bishop of London. The king, therefore, presented to William, his chancellor, the bishopric of Winchester; but he declined to receive it, except from archbishop Anselm. He restored to Odo the abbey of Chertsey. He gave Coventry to Robert, bishop of Chester. Ralph Passeflabere was thrown into prison. Hugh, from being a monk of Winchester, was made abbot of the new monastery.

A. D. 1101. Ralph de Passeflabere escaped from prison; and repaired to the duke of Normandy. The king was crowned at Winchester at Easter; and Gifard, with Anselm's assent, received the bishopric of Winchester. Duke Robert came to England, with two hundred ships, and Ralph Passeflabere along with him. After many disasters brought upon the kingdom, the brothers were reconciled; that is to say, on this condition, that the king should give duke Robert two thousand pounds a-year. He restored his bishopric to Ralph.

A. D. 1102. London was burnt down twice; so also was Winchester; and Gloucester, with the abbey. Roger, the king's chaplain, was made bishop of Salisbury.

A. D. 1103. William Giffard was deprived of the bishopric of Winchester, because he declined to receive it from Gerald, archbishop of York, and went to Rome. On his return, he obtained his bishopric, with all the property of which it had been despoiled within and without.

A. D. 1107. Edulf, a monk of Winchester, obtained the abbey of Malmesbury.

A. D. 1107. William Giffard, and Robert, bishop of Salisbury, were consecrated by archbishop Anselm. Ernulf, prior of Canterbury, obtained the abbey of Peterborough; Hugh, monk of Winchester, that of Chertsey; and Peter, that of Gloucester. Maurice, bishop of London, died. Godefrid, prior of Winchester, of venerable memory, departed this life, and was succeeded by Gaudfrid, a monk of the same place. The tower of the church fell, on the nones of October [7th Oct.].

A. D. 1108. Ralph, bishop of Chichester, caused the church to be dedicated. Gundulf, bishop of Rochester, died; and archbishop Anselm gave the bishopric to Ralph, abbot of Seez. Gerold, archbishop of York, died, and was succeeded by one of the king's clerks, named Thomas. Richard, a clerk of the count of Belesme, obtained the bishopric of London.

A. D. 1109. Gerold, abbot of Tewksbury, having neither the inclination nor the ability to satiate the king's avarice with gifts, left his abbey and returned to the church of Winchester, in which he had made his profession.

A. D. 1110. The king caused the monastery of St. Grimbald to be removed from the precincts of the episcopal church to the suburb of the city, on the north side, with the monks and relics. Robert was made abbot of Tewksbury.

A. D. 1111. Bishop William deposed prior Gaufrid; and, with the consent of the convent, that Gaufrid, who had the charge of the granary, was put in his room. In the same year bishop William, will he, nill he, gave to the king eight hundred marks. In this year were burnt down Canterbury, Taunton, Oxford, and many other towns. In this year the relics of St. Adewold were taken out of the old shrine and placed in a new one, in the presence of the queen, three bishops, and five abbots.

A. D. 1113. Peter, abbot of Gloucester, died, and was succeeded by William, a monk of the same church.

A. D. 1114. Theobald, obtained the bishopric of Worcester. In the same year, Thomas, archbishop of York, departed this life, and was succeeded by Turstan. Ralph, bishop of Rochester, obtained the archbishopric of Canterbury. The church of Chiccester was burnt down. The archbishop of Canterbury gave the bishopric of Rochester to Ernulf, abbot of Peterborough, and the abbey of Peterborough to John, a monk of Seez.

A. D. 1115. Reginald, bishop of Hereford, departed this life, and was succeeded by Gaufrid.

A. D. 1116. There was a dissension between the archbishops; because he of York, refusing to be consecrated by him of Canterbury, resigned the archbishopric without an equivalent. In the same year the pope demanded of the king certain customs, which his predecessor never received; wherefore the king sent to him Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, and Herbert, bishop of Norwich, and Hugh, abbot of Chertsey. Robert, bishop of Chester, died; and Herlewin, abbot of Glastonbury.

A. D. 1117. Turstan, archbishop of York, and Herbert, bishop of Norwich, and Hugh, abbot of Chertsey, returned from the Roman pontiff. Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, remained with the king in Normandy. Robert, the first prior, accepted the priorate at Merton. Gilbert, abbot of Westminster, died.

A. D. 1118. Edulf, without reason assigned, lost the abbey of Malmesbury.

A. D. 1119. Gaufrid, bishop of Hereford, died. Pope Calixtus held a council at St. Remigius [at Reims], and consecrated Turstan, archbishop of York. Gaufrid was made abbot of St. Alban's. Henry, earl of Warwick, died.

A. D. 1121. The king gave to Richard his clerk the bishopric of Hereford; to Robert, the bishopric of Chester; to Everard, the bishopric of Norwich; and the abbey of Westminster to Herbert, a monk of the same place; the abbey of Abingdon to Vincent; and the abbey of Glastonbury to Sefrid, a monk of Seez.

A. D. 1122. There occurred a strange dissension (more fit to be buried in oblivion than recorded) between William, bishop of Winchester, and his monks, on the subject of dilapidations, and more especially respecting nine churches of which he had deprived them, and which had belonged to the manors of the monks. As they knew not what to do, they turned the crucifixes upside down, and went in procession, barefooted, and, contrary to the course of the sun and to the custom of the church; to imply that, as the bishop had, contrary to the canonical decrees, deprived those who served God in his church of their necessary food, so they would serve the church in a way opposed to law and to the ecclesiastical decrees. The king took part with the monks, but nearly all the principal nobility of England sided with the bishop. Gloucester, with the church of St. Peter, was burnt down.

A. D. 1123. In this year, on the death of Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, William of Curbuil, prior of St. Ositha, succeeded, and was consecrated by William Giffard, bishop of Winchester. Theobald, bishop of Worcester, died.

A. D. 1124. William Giffard and the monks were reconciled, through the mediation of the king; for by the king's command the bishop came unattended into the charter of the monks; and the monks, as the king had enjoined them, prostrated themselves, barefooted, at his feet, promising full satisfaction for what they had done amiss. And he, observing their humiliation and remorse, fell down at their feet; for he was a man of blameless piety, and the meekest of human beings. He complied with all their demands, and by his charter made over to the convent these and many other things, to be held by them for ever, under the bond of anathema.

A. D. 1125. All the mintmasters of the kingdom were mutilated, except three, at Winchester. John de Crema held a council in London. It is reported that Ralph de Passeflabere was accused before the said John, of incontinence, and of many other things that are unbecoming holy persons: but, though often summoned to undergo degradation, he met the citations with divers excuses, and did not make his appearance before the judgment-seat. Hereupon the legate hastened to Durham,¹ and was received with due respect. After the wine had circled freely, and was beginning to work, the legate became deeply enamoured of a young lady of eminent personal charms, the niece of the bishop. He made an assignation with her, and she, as the bishop had desired her, went to his bed-chamber to put it in order, according to the Roman custom. When she had lain down upon the bed, the bishop, with the clerks and attendants, entered the chamber, bearing goblets and lamps, which with their radiance, illumined the shades of night. Standing round the legate's couch, they shouted aloud, "Benedicite, benedicite." Whereat he, astounded, said, "By St. Peter, what are ye about?" "My lord," said the bishop, "it is the custom of our country, whenever a nobleman is married, for his friends to pay him this mark of respect and courtesy. Rise, then, and drink what is in the cup which I hold in my hand. If you refuse to do so, assuredly you shall instantly drink of a cup, after which you shall thirst no more." Up he rose then, will he, nill he, and, naked as he was, he drank to the bride half of what was in the bishop's goblet. The bishop then retired, no longer in dread of losing his bishopric. But the legate, before the dawn of day, making his escape with his disgrace and his concubine, returned with all possible speed to Rome.

A. D. 1126. Prior Gaufrid died.

A. D. 1127. Randulf, bishop of Durham, died.

A. D. 1128. William, bishop of the church of Winchester, the most compassionate and pious of men, departed to the Lord. This man, of venerable and grateful memory, after troubles and molestations that had been brought upon the monks of Winchester at the suggestion and wicked instigation of profligate men, and after they had been mutually reconciled, loved them, all and singular, as his own soul; insomuch that, as often as he came to Winchester, he went down to the church-door, and, after offering up a prayer with groanings, and sometimes with tears, visited the monks, whether they were assembled in the cloister, or the refectory, and gave them his blessing. And as often as he could, he sought opportunity to be with them; so that he used to spend the noon with them in their dormitory, to take refreshment with them in the refectory, and that sometimes at supper too; and he would take the lowest seat with the novices. Finally, he assumed the habit of a monk, and breathed out his spirit to God in the monks' infirmary.

A. D. 1129. Henry, the nephew of king Henry, son of his sister Adela, brother of Stephen, count of Moreton and Boulogne, afterwards king, from being abbot of Glastonbury, became bishop of Winchester.

A. D. 1130. Robert obtained the bishopric of Hereford.

A. D. 1134. Henry, bishop of Winchester, fulfilled the office of legate in England.

A. D. 1138. Bishop Henry caused a residence, resembling a palace, to be built, with a very strong tower, in Winchester; also the castles of Merton, and Farnham, and Wautham, and Dunton, and Taunton.

A. D. 1139. Roger, bishop of Salisbury, died, and the archbishop of York.

A. D. 1141. King Stephen was taken prisoner by Robert, earl of Gloucester. Whereupon the empress was received as regent at Winchester, by the lord legate, Henry, bishop of Winchester, and nearly all the nobility of England, and received the homage and fealty of all. The Londoners, however, did not take the oath of fealty, or, if they did, they took it unwillingly. But whether they did so or not, they were perpetually plotting against her; insomuch that when she happened to visit London, they tried by every means to get possession of her person; but, forewarned, she left all her moveables, and, with a few of her attendants, escaped privately. Then there ensued a dissension between the legate and the empress; and she, with her adherents, held the royal castle and the eastern portion of Winchester: the townsmen sided with her: the legate and his party, and the Londoners, held the castle, with the western portion of Winchester. It is needless to add more. The city was burnt and laid waste. The church of the nuns, and the church of Hyde were burnt; and the great cross was stripped of its outer covering, and within it were found upwards of five hundred marks of silver, and thirty of gold.

A.D. 1143. Pope Innocent died, and was succeeded by Celestine. Bishop Henry, during the pontificate of the aforesaid pope Innocent, on account of the extraordinary regard they had for each other, visited Rome. In what year he went thither I cannot tell; but he prevailed upon the pope to change the bishopric of Winchester into an archbishopric, and the abbey of Hide into a bishopric, and to subject the bishopric of Chichester to himself. And this he did on account of the frequent disputes which took place between the bishop and the archbishop of Canterbury; for the one deemed himself superior, because he was archbishop, the other, because he was legate.

A.D. 1145. Gaufrid, abbot of St. Alban's, died, and was succeeded by Ralph.

A.D. 1146. Robert, earl of Gloucester, died. This Robert was a good man, and the most loyal of the grandees of all England. When the adherents of Henry, bishop of Winchester, set fire to the church of the nuns of Winchester and Werewel, and the church of Hide, he spared the church of St. Swithun, although he might have burnt it if he had thought proper.

A.D. 1147. William, archbishop of York, was banished from his archbishopric; and Henry, bishop of Winchester, on account of his sanctity, and because the archbishop had ordained and consecrated him, received him, with his attendants, with due respect, into his house, and provided him and his with necessaries. But he, as far as he could, and as far as bishop Henry would let him, spent his time with the monks of Winchester, and prized their holiness of life as much as that of angels, eating and drinking with them, and sleeping in their dormitory.

A.D. 1148. Robert, bishop of Hereford, died, and was succeeded by Gilbert Folioth, abbot of Gloucester.

A.D. 1149. The greater number of the monks of Hide went to Rome, with complaints against Hugh de Lens, their abbot, against whom an appeal had previously been made by the same monks touching certain controversies which had been agitated amongst them. The same monks had also appealed against bishop Henry, concerning the pillaging of the treasure of their church, and more especially concerning the removal of the precious ornaments of the great cross of their church, and their abstraction.

A. D. 1150. The relics of the holy confessors, Birin, Swithun, Ædda, Birstan, and Elfege, were translated. Gaufrid, abbot of St. Alban's, died, and was succeeded by Robert de Gorram.

A. D. 1151. Henry, bishop of Winchester, went to Rome to clear himself before the supreme pontiff from the charges which had been made against him by Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, and the monks of Hide, and many others. Having made his peace with the pope, after much wrangling, and many gifts presented by the bishop, and many more promised by him, he returned with his original authority, to his own possessions.

A. D. 1152. Theobald of Blois, brother of bishop Henry, died; also Gilbert de Clare, and Ralph de Peronne.

A. D. 1154. William, archbishop of York, having made his peace with his people, through the mediation of bishop Henry, when he had returned from exile, was cut off by poison, as is reported, the poison having been put by his archdeacon in his own chalice.

A. D. 1155. Robert, bishop of Exeter, and Matilda, abbess of Ramsey, and Robert de Gorram, abbot of St. Alban's, departed this life.

A. D. 1159. Walter, bishop of Chester, died; as also Ingulf, abbot of Abingdon; and Roger, abbot of Evesham; and William, earl de Warrenne, on his way home from the siege of Toulouse.

A. D. 1160. Robert, bishop of Exeter, and Alured, bishop of Worcester, died,

A. D. 1161. Master Bartholomew was made bishop of Exeter, and Richard Pecche, of Chester. London was burnt, and Winchester, and Canterbury, and Exeter.

A. D. 1162. Thomas was consecrated archbishop at Canterbury, by Henry, bishop of Winchester, in the presence of fourteen bishops, on the octave of Whitsuntide [3rd June],¹ after having filled the office of chancellor for five years. He was then in his forty-fourth year.

A. D. 1163. Gilbert Folioth resigned the bishopric of Hereford, and took the bishopric of London. Roger, the son of Robert, earl of Gloucester, was made bishop of Worcester, and Robert de Melun, bishop of Hereford; they were consecrated by the archbishop. In the same year archbishop Thomas dedicated the monastery of Reading, in the presence of king Henry, and several of the nobles of England. Henry² of Essex was overcome by Robert of Mountford, and became a monk of Reading.

A. D. 1164. William, the king's brother, died; likewise Roger, abbot of Reading, and Walkelin, abbot of Abingdon.

A. D. 1166. Robert, bishop of Bath, died; and also Robert de Chenni, bishop of Lincoln; and Robert de Melun, bishop of Hereford; and Robert de Gorram, abbot of St. Alban's, who was succeeded by Simeon; and Gaufrid, earl of Mandeville.

A. D. 1167. The great cross was consecrated by bishop Henry.

¹ Other authorities say, on the 27th May, which was Whitsunday.

² See Dugd. Baron. i. 407, 463.

A. D. 1168. Robert, earl of Leicester, died, and Patrick,¹ bishop [earl] of Salisbury.

A. D. 1169. Nigel, bishop of Ely, and Hilary, bishop of Chichester, died.

A. D. 1170. Simeon, abbot of St. Alban's, died.

A. D. 1171. Henry, bishop of Winchester, than whom never was man more chaste and prudent, more compassionate, or more earnest in transacting ecclesiastical matters, or in beautifying churches, departed to the Lord, whom with his whole heart he had loved, and whose ministers, the monks, and all other religious, he had honoured as the Lord himself. May his soul repose in the bosom of Abraham! Abbot Selid died.

A. D. 1172. Henry, son of king Henry, was crowned at Winchester, with his consort Margaret, daughter of Louis, king of France. One Roger, a priest, was struck dead by lightning in Andover church, in the night of the anniversary of our Lord's Nativity.

A. D. 1173. Richard, prior of Canterbury, was elected archbishop of Canterbury. Richard, archdeacon of Poitou, was elected in the kalends of May [1st May], bishop of Winchester; as was also Gaufrid Ridal, to be bishop of Ely; Robert Foliot, to be bishop of Hereford; dean John, to be bishop of Chichester; and Robert, prior of Winchester, to be abbot of Glastonbury.

A. D. 1174. Richard, and the rest of the bishops elect, mentioned above, were ordained and consecrated on the second of the nones of October [6th Oct.].

A. D. 1175. Robert, prior of Winchester, was made abbot of Westminster; and Thomas, prior of Bermondsey, abbot of Hyde; and the prior of Bermondsey, abbot of Abingdon.

A. D. 1178. The church of Tewkesbury was burnt to ashes. In the same year died Fromond, abbot of Tewkesbury. William, abbot of Ramsey, was made abbot of Clugni.

A. D. 1180. Roger, archbishop of York, died. In the same year, Thomas, abbot of Hyde, resigned his abbey. In the night of St. Swithun's eve [1st July], the mint in Winchester took fire, and the flames spreading thence, consumed the greater and better part of Winchester.

A. D. 1182. St. Barnabas first rendered himself remarkable at Hyde, by miracles wrought of God, for his deserts; and then the church began to be repaired and improved.

A. D. 1184. Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, died; and also Gerard, bishop of Chester; and Walter, bishop of Rochester. Glastonbury was completely burnt down.

A. D. 1185. The patriarch of Jerusalem arrived in England, and was received with fitting respect at Winchester by a procession, the king being then present, and nearly all the bishops and abbots of all England. John, abbot of Hyde, went to Rome, on the business of the pall of Baldwin, elect of Canterbury. Gilbert de Glanville was made bishop of Rochester.

¹ Patric, earl of Salisbury, (not bishop, as erroneously described in the text,) was slain by Gui de Lesignan. See Dugd. Baron. i. 175.

A. D. 1186. Bartholomew, bishop of Exeter, died.

A. D. 1187. Robert de Melun, from being sub-prior of Winchester, became abbot of Malmesbury. John, prior of the church of Winchester, a man of great simplicity, departed to the Lord; he was succeeded by Robert, son of Henry.

A. D. 1188. Armed men were brought into the church of Winchester, who, not fearing to lift their hands against the anointed of the Lord, dragged forth some of God's servants at the wicked instigation and command of certain noblemen. In the same year, Richard, of worthy memory, bishop of Winchester, departed to the Lord.

A. D. 1189. Lord Godfrid de Lucy obtained the bishopric of Winchester; and Richard, the treasurer, the bishopric of London; and William, the king's chancellor, the bishopric of Ely. Gaufrid Ridcl, bishop of Ely, died.

A. D. 1190. Richard, king of England, set out for Jerusalem, with Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, and Hubert Walter, bishop of Salisbury, and Ralph de¹
. . . . John de Custances, nephew of the archbishop of Rouen, was made bishop of Worcester.

A. D. 1197. William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, and chancellor to the king, dying, went the way, which, while living, he had earned for himself, and was buried at Poitiers, where he expired. He was a man that was held in high repute for worldly wisdom and admirable eloquence, and no one was ever more stedfast in maintaining an attachment once conceived; and he might have deserved the appellation of the 'Monks' Friend,' had he not, when once he bore either sword, by apostolic and royal authority, given way to the religion of their opponents, seeing that in the great council, held by him in London, he confirmed, as far as lay in his power, the ejection of the monks of Coventry.

In Normandy, William, earl of Salisbury, died, and William de Beauchamp,—men highly distinguished for generosity of disposition, and beneficence of mind, whose untimely death was the occasion of bitter grief to their relatives and friends. Master Martin, a monk, sometime prior of Tudford, though not canonically elected, was, notwithstanding, made abbot of Chertsey,—no matter who took offence at it,—another abbot still living. While they were installing him, a rather ominous circumstance occurred; while the convent met him, according to custom, in procession, an attendant who was carrying the pall, dropped down at the instant when the abbot was entering the church; and no sooner did the abbot, who was going to officiate, take upon him the dignity of his abbey, than the minister of the introit felt the avenging blow.

Richard, brother of H[erbert], bishop of Salisbury, was made dean of Salisbury. Eustachius, chancellor to the king, a man of great wisdom and judgment, was made bishop of Ely. Peter, bishop of St. David's, repaired to Risus, king of Wales, beseeching him, with fatherly affection, not to disturb the peace of God's holy church, and of his master, the king of England. But the bishop not only laboured in vain, but was reviled into the bargain; he therefore withdrew from court exceedingly exasperated. But the following night unfaithful children, sent by the king, dragged the bishop from his couch, with nothing on him but his nightgown and drawers, till he was rescued by some of the men of William de Brews. But as soon as it was day, the bishop, having summoned his archdeacons and the presbyters of the whole diocese, with their assistance, smote with anathema both the king and the king's sons, with all his land. So the bishop's curse entered into the inward parts of the obstinate monarch like water, and like oil into his bones; and he died a few days after under the bond of the anathema. But Griffin, somewhat more tractable than his father, with his brothers and friends, approached the bishop, entreating him, with tears, to have pity upon him, and promising that he would yield to his master the king of England, and to himself, all due submission and reverence. So the bishop, on condition that the body of the deceased king, already putrid, should be scourged, and that his sons should be scourged likewise, and with the assent and authority of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, absolved the deceased, his sons, and their land.

A. D. 1198. Eustace, the king's chancellor, was consecrated bishop of Ely, in London, by the archbishop of Canterbury, on the eighth of the ides of March [8th March]. Hugh de Nunant, bishop of Chester, fell into ill health. The monks of Coventry were brought into their church, and Master Jorbert, prior of Wenlock, was made their prior. The bishop of Salisbury, having been disseized of all his property by the king's command, passed over to the continent in the month of February. Lord Godfrid, bishop of Winchester, crossed the sea on the tenth of the kalends of April [23rd March]; he returned to England in the month of June; and on the sixteenth of the kalends of August [17th July], he landed at Pevensey. Gaufrid Fitz-Peter, a man of guileless spirit, and one who had a singular affection for the church of Winchester, caused the body of his father, who had been a lay brother of the same place, to be removed from the burying ground of the monks into the church, and then to be reentombed with due ceremony, in the presence of the abbot of Tewkesbury, and the abbot of Hyde, and many other persons of rank, on the eighth of the ides of May [8th May].

Simon, the abbot of Pershore, died at Bermondsey, on the fourth of the ides of May [12th May]. The archbishop of York was reconciled to the king his brother, through the mediation of Godfrid, bishop of Winchester, and the king received him with the kiss of peace.

Hugh de Nunant, bishop of Chester, after the monks of Coventry had been brought into his church, out of which they had been driven by the same bishop, after a lingering illness and insufferable agony, closed his wretched existence with a death that he deserved, on the sixth of the kalends of April [27th March], being Good Friday, and was buried in the church of Bec-Herlewin.

Herbert Poor, bishop of Salisbury, having returned from Normandy by the favour of our lord the king, landed in England on the sixth of the ides of June [8th June]. Walter, prior of Bath, a man of eminent learning and piety, closed his life in Christ at Werewell. From being sub-prior of Hyde, he was made prior of Bath, on account of the excellence of his character for sanctity; and after he had minutely instructed the monks in the monastic order, reflecting within himself how trivial the glory of this world is, how transitory is human reputation, how empty the title of prelate, choosing rather to consult his own real profit, than to exercise authority over others,—betook himself to the Carthusians. When a certain monk of Hyde came to see him, and, perceiving that he, who a little while before used to be deeply intent upon the salvation of souls, was now busy with dishes and herbs, said to him with a sneer, “My noble father, what you are doing is Kere, what you are handling is Kerewiwere.” But he, coming to himself, after a few days, and understanding, as well by prayer as by the instruction of his masters, that it was more holy to save many souls, than only one, returned to his priorate, and to this he strictly confined himself till the hour of his death. He was buried at Bath, on the second of the kalends of June [31st May].

A Lombard Jew lent to the convent, on St. Swithun's Eve [1st July], ten pounds and one mark. Gaufrid of Muschamp, who had been archdeacon of Cleveland, was made bishop of Chester, and was consecrated by archbishop Hubert Walter in the church of Canterbury on the eleventh of the kalends of July [21st June]. Peter, bishop of St. David's, a man of signal piety, and no less exemplary in his conduct than eminent for his cultivated manners, on the fragile body's earthen vessel being broken, departed this life, to be clothed in heaven with the robe of immortality by Him, for whom on earth he had often endured the sorrows of this world.

Master Anselm, a monk of Reading, was made abbot of Pershore. Eustace, sacristan of Middleton, was made abbot of the same church. Richard Fitz-Nigel, sometime bishop of Ely, and apothecary to king Henry, and at length bishop of London, a man of venerable and most pious memory and wisdom, whose every word seemed to every one that he conversed with to distil sweetness, departed from this world, and left the body tenantless, on the fourth of the ides of September [10th Sept.]. This most charitable and compassionate man so far excelled all the men of influence and business in England, that, in comparison with him, all might be reputed and were reputed avaricious. Knowing, then, and cherishing it in his memory, that nothing is more base, nothing casts a deeper stain upon the reputation of persons of rank than a stinted hospitality, this man of most diligent hospitality and beneficence, whose memory is blessed of heaven, admitted every one to his table, except such as their own villany or profligate life repelled from it. In the month of September died John de Custances, bishop of Worcester.

A. D. 1199. Andrew, abbot of Peterborough, died, and also Juliana, abbess of Rumesey, in the month of February. King

Richard was transfixed with an arrow at the town of Chaluz, on the seventh of the kalends of April [26th March], and died on Tuesday, the eighth of the ides of the same month [6th April], and his body was buried at the feet of his father, king Henry, at Fontevrault. It is worthy of observation, that the said king was buried with the same crown and other insignia of royalty with which he had been crowned and robed at Winchester.

Master William Pica was elected abbot of Glastonbury. Matilda, half-sister by the father's side of Walter Walerand, was made abbess of Rumesey, on the third of the nones of June [3d June]. Hugh, abbot of Reading, was made abbot of Clugni. The church of Chichester was dedicated by Sefrid, bishop of the same place, on the second of the ides of September [12th Sept.] King John was crowned at Westminster on Ascension-day [27th May], being the sixth of the kalends of June.

A. D. 1200. The tower of the church of Winchester was begun and finished. In the month of March died Odo, abbot of Battle, and was succeeded by John of Dover, a monk of Canterbury. In the same year died William the Simple, abbot of Ramsey; who was succeeded by Yvo, prior of Peterborough. In the same month the prior of St. Alban's, named Acharius, was made abbot of Peterborough. William Postard, abbot of Westminster, died. Ralph de Arundel, who had been prior of Herlie, was made abbot of Westminster. John de Gray, who had been archdeacon of Oxford, was made bishop of Norwich, and was consecrated, in London, by archbishop Hubert Walter. In the same year, Gilda,¹ son of William de Breus, was consecrated bishop of Hereford. Hugh, bishop of Lincoln, of pious and sacred memory, who had been prior of the Carthusians,² died.

A. D. 1201. About midnight, on the night of the Seven Holy Sleepers [27th July], a dreadful and but too melancholy quarrel broke out between two pretended brethren of Hyde and a pair of abbots of the same place, which resulted in the infliction of very severe loss and suffering upon many innocent individuals.

A. D. 1202. Godfred de Lucy, lord [bishop] of Winchester, established, for the repair of the church of Winchester, a brotherhood, which was to be kept up for full five years. Gaufrid, earl of Perch, died, and also Alan, abbot of Tewkesbury, who had been prior of Canterbury. In this year peace and concord were brought about and confirmed between the lord [archbishop] of Canterbury and the monks of the same place, by means of arbitrators appointed by the supreme pontiff, touching a dispute which had been agitated between them respecting the church of Lambeth, which the lord [archbishop] of Canterbury had caused to be erected to the prejudice, as it was thought, of the church of Canterbury. Here is the form:—"We, Eustace, bishop of Ely, the abbot of St. Edmund's, the dean of Lincoln, supplying the place of lord H[ugh], bishop of Lincoln, being chosen arbitrators by the lord archbishop of Canterbury and the convent, having mutually agreed in due form, have provided and ordained, for the sake of peace and tranquillity, that if the lord archbishop of Canterbury shall think proper to build a church at Lambeth, he may do so in this way:—" Let him build where he pleases, provided that it be not upon the foundation of that work which, by the authority of our lord the pope, hath been pulled down. Let canons be appointed for that church, of the Premonstratensian order, provided that they be not more than twenty, nor fewer than thirteen. This church the lord archbishop may endow to the amount of one hundred pounds a year out of the churches to him pertaining, or out of other property which he holds in the name of the church of Canterbury, except the churches of Monkton, Estrie, Hemesford, and Mepham, and the churches which are in the manors of the monks, together with other things which have been brought into question before us. And this church is to be of moderate dimensions; to be determined by the aforesaid number of persons, and the aforesaid endowment; having regard to . . . the moderate size of the church which the canons of the same order use. And, for the purpose of removing all ground for jealousy and offence, we provide that the archbishops shall not hold ordinations in this church, or councils, or consecrations of bishops, or benedictions of abbots; neither shall they consecrate chrism in it; neither shall the archbishops assemble a congregation of seculars, or grant endowments out of the property of the church of Canterbury, without the assent of the convent. The clerks are to retain the churches, which they now hold, under a yearly rent, so long as they live; but on the death of each they are to revert to the church of Canterbury."

A. D. 1204. On the 11th of September, Godfrid de Lucy, bishop of Winchester, died, as did also queen Eleonor; and Sefred, bishop of Chichester.

A. D. 1205. On the sixth of the ides of July [10th July], died Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury. Peter de Rupibus was consecrated bishop of Winchester, at Rome, by pope Innocent the third, on the Sunday next preceding the feast of St. Michael [25th Sept.].

A. D. 1206. Peter, bishop of Winchester, having returned from Rome, was received at Winchester by a solemn procession, and was enthroned on Palm Sunday, the seventh of the ides of April [7th April].¹

A. D. 1207. Master Stephen Langton was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, at Viterbo, by our lord pope Innocent, on the fifteenth of the kalends of July [17th June]. Henry, son of king John by queen Isabella, born at Winchester, on the kalends of October [1st Oct.], in this year; he was named Henry, after his grandfather.

A. D. 1213. King John was absolved by Pandulf, legate of our lord the pope, on St. Margaret's day [20th July], at Winchester; the interdict continuing nevertheless.

A. D. 1216. Louis landed in the Isle of Thanet on the Saturday

¹ In the year 1206, the 7th of April fell upon a Saturday; the true date is the 7th of the kalends of April [26th March]. See Hardy's Le Neve, iii. 8.

after Ascension-day [21st May]. King John fled, although he might have stood his ground with ease. On Whitsun-eve [28th May], John arrived at Winchester, with Galas, the legate. On Whitmonday [30th May], that is, in the second day of the week after the arrival of Louis, the king retired, with Peter, bishop of Winchester, who on Whitsunday [29th May], had excommunicated Louis and all his followers. But the king committed the castle of Winchester to Savaric de Maulyon, to guard it along with the city; but he, immediately after the king's departure, set the suburbs on fire, and withdrew. Louis laid siege to the castle, which, after many days, surrendered to him by the advice of the said Savaric; and he soon afterwards took the rest of the castles of Hampshire. John died at Newark, on the fourteenth of the kalends of November [19th Oct.]; and his body was buried at Worcester. His son Henry was crowned at Gloucester, in the tenth year of his age, on the day of St. Simon and St. Jude the Apostles [28th Oct.], by Gales, the legate, and many others.

A. D. 1217. Richard, bishop of Chichester, was translated to Salisbury.

A. D. 1221. Peter, bishop of Winchester, went to St. James's.¹ The same bishop took the cross.

A. D. 1222. Ranulf, bishop of Chichester, died, and was succeeded by Ralph of Newtown. John [abbot] of Hyde, died, and was succeeded by Walter, a monk of the same church.

A. D. 1224. Peter, bishop of Winchester, in full synod, excommunicated the disturbers and insurgents against the rights of the church. The church of Montesfont was dedicated.

A. D. 1227. Peter, bishop of Winchester, and William, bishop of Exeter, set out on their way to the Holy Land.

A. D. 1228. Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, died on the nones of July [7th July]. Richard, bishop of Salisbury, was made bishop of Durham. Walter, a monk of Canterbury, was elected archbishop.

A. D. 1229. Robert Byngham was made bishop of Salisbury. Richard, chancellor of Lincoln, was made archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1230. King Henry returned to England; and, after the feast of All Saints [1st Nov.], he was received, in solemn procession, by the convent in the greater church of Winchester, in the presence of Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, with some of his suffragans.

A. D. 1231. Roger, archdeacon of Winchester, died, while on a pilgrimage. The church of St. Giles, at Winchester, was burnt down. Peter, bishop of Winchester, on his return from the Holy Land, was received in his church on the day of St. Peter ad Vincula [1st Aug.], and offered one of the feet of St. Philip.

A. D. 1232. King Henry entrusted to the safe keeping of Peter, bishop of Winchester, and of Peter de Rywalles, several shires and castles, and also his treasury. Master John Blundus was elected archbishop of Canterbury, but he was set aside by our lord the pope. A lad named Stephen was tortured and murdered by the Jews at Winchester, on the sixteenth of the kalends of November [17th Oct.].

A. D. 1233. Master Edmund, treasurer of Salisbury, was elected archbishop of Canterbury, and confirmed by the pope.

A. D. 1234. Master Edmund was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury on the fourth of the nones of April [2nd April]. A quarrel broke out between king Henry and Peter, bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Ryvallis. An embargo was laid upon them at Dover; and on the eve of the Apostles Peter and Paul [28th June], they came to Winchester. On the anniversary of the Deposition of St. Swithun [2nd July], Richard Syward, and several others, arrived to search for Peter de Ryvallis; and when they had looked for him in vain, they forcibly led off the horses belonging to the bishop and the prior. But the bishop excommunicated those assailants, and laid the church and the whole city under an interdict. But in the morning they expressed their penitence, and were absolved. On the following day the church and city were reconciled. Peter, bishop of Winchester, set out for Rome on the day after Ash-Wednesday [22d Feb.]: he crossed the sea on the fourth of the nones of March [4th March]. In the same month, on St. Cuthbert's day [20th March], the said bishop Peter and the monks of St. Swithun were reconciled by the interposition of W. the Official and master R. Stamford.

He died at Pounteny on the eleventh of the kalends of September [22nd August], and his body was buried in the abbey Pounteny.

on the fifth of the kalends of July [27th June]. Walter, his brother, was made earl of Pembroke.

A. D. 1242. King Henry and queen Eleonor arrived at Winchester on the fifth of the kalends of May [27th April]. On the day of the Apostles Philip and James [1st May], the queen came to the chapter of Winchester to be admitted into that society. On the day of the Translation of St. Nicolas [9th May], the king and queen, earl Richard, the king's brother, and R., the Mareshal, put to sea at Portsmouth for Gascony.

A. D. 1243. The king, returning from Gascony, landed at Portsmouth on the seventh of the kalends of October [25th Sept.], and arrived at Winchester on St. Michael's-eve [28th Sept.]. On the day of the Apostles Peter and Paul [29th June], William Raley was translated to the bishopric of Winchester, and confirmed; and on Christmas-eve [24th Dec.], he arrived at Winchester, but was not permitted to enter. He then came, bare-footed, to each of the gates of the city, which, by the king's orders, were shut against him. On seeing this he retired; and on the day after the feast of St. Thomas the Martyr [29th Dec.], he came to the gate of Kyngate, preaching to the people the word of God. After sermon he placed the mother church, and the rest of the churches within the city walls, under an interdict, and excommunicated the monks, and clerks, and aldermen of the city, and all its bailiffs. Then he crossed the sea on the ninth of the kalends of March [21st Feb.], because certain persons had plotted against him. Boniface was admitted to the see of Canterbury, and was confirmed by the pope on the day of the Nativity of the blessed Virgin Mary [8th Sept.].

A. D. 1244. The archbishop elect of Canterbury arrived in England on the feast of St. Gregory [12th March]. William, bishop of Winchester, by the king's orders, returned to England, and the king gave him the kiss of peace. A. D. 1248. A new coinage was issued at Winchester after the octave of the Epiphany [13th Jan.]. Walter, Abbot of Hyde, died, and was succeeded by Roger of St. Waleric. On the fifth of the kalends of June [28th May]—Ascension-day—the vane of the tower of St. Swithun fell, while the vesper bell was ringing, and nearly crushed a monk. The justices itinerant were at Winchester on the day after the feast of St. Hilary [14th Jan.], namely—Henry of Bath, Roger of Cobham, William of Winchester, and Roger of Cerne. Nicholas, bishop of Durham, resigned his bishopric on the day of the Purification of the blessed Virgin Mary [2d Feb.].

A. D. 1249. The king kept his Whitsuntide [23d May] at Winchester. Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, landed in England on the day of St. Matthew the Apostle [21st Sept.]; and on the same day a general chapter was assembled at Exeter, but was adjourned to the feast of pope St. Calixtus in London [14th Oct.], because all the prelates had not then assembled at Exeter. Boniface was enthroned at Canterbury on the feast of All Saints [1st Nov.]. The king spent his Christmas at Winchester; and Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, celebrated mass, at which the king made his foes in Gascony his tributaries. John de Calceto, prior of Winchester, was made abbot of Bury, and was succeeded by William of Taunton, on the day of St. Scholastica the Virgin [10th Feb.]. William, bishop of Winchester, and the bishop of Lincoln, and several others, passed over to the continent after Midlent [6th March].

A. D. 1250. A sharp dissension arose between Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, on the one part, and Fulco, of London, and the canons of St. Paul, on the other, touching the holding of a visitation in that church. William, bishop of Winchester, died at Tours, and was buried there, in the church of St. Martin, the first of September. Lord Adomar, bishop elect of Winchester, landed in England, at Dover, on the Nativity of John Baptist [24th June]; and on the day after the feast of Mary Magdalen [23d July], he came to Winchester, where he was met by a grand procession, the king being present, and many others. The dedication of earl Richard's church of Heyles on the nones of November [5th Nov.].

A. D. 1252. After the octave of Easter [7th April], a definitive judgment was pronounced by the pope in favour of lord Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, against the bishop and canons of London, touching the holding of a visitation in that church, and in all the churches of his province. King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester. Master Richard de Wyce, bishop of Chichester, died on the sixth of the ides of April [8th April], and was succeeded by John, surnamed Bishop, a canon of the said church. A great dissension arose between Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, and Adomar, bishop elect of Winchester, touching the advowson of the hospital of St. Thomas the Martyr, in Southwark; but at last they were reconciled.

A. D. 1253. At the feast of the Holy Trinity, which occurred on the seventeenth of the kalends of July [15th June], Henry, king of England, was at Winchester, whence he set out for Portsmouth, to cross the sea to Gascony. There was a convocation of all the abbots and priors of the black order at Exeter, on the morrow of the feast of St. Matthew the Apostle [22d Sept.], on account of a certain privilege that had been granted by our lord the pope to all the bishops of England, to the prejudice of the monastic order. Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, died, on the fourth of the nones of October [4th Oct.], and was succeeded by Henry of Lexington, canon and dean of the same church, by election, on the sixteenth of the kalends of June [17th May]. Also Hugh de Rupibus, archdeacon of Winchester, died. There also arose a violent dissension between the monks of Winchester, and Adomar, elect of Winchester. Whereupon William of Taunton, prior, crossed the sea to visit the pope.

A. D. 1254. The queen arrived at Winchester on Whitsun-eve [30th May], and on Friday [5th June], she set out for Portsmouth, for the purpose of embarking for Gascony, with her eldest son Edward, to join the king. Henry of Lexington was consecrated bishop of Lincoln on the Sunday after Ascension-day [24th May], in London, by Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury. Hugh, bishop of Ely, sometime abbot of St. Edmund's, died; and was succeeded by master William of Kilkenny, chancellor to our lord the king. William, prior of Winchester, arrived in Rome, to whom pope Innocent had given, before his decease, with the assent of the brethren, the ring, mitre, staff, and other symbols of dignity. The reason why he went to the court of Rome was, because Adomar, bishop elect, had deprived him of his priorate, and the rest of the obedientiaries of their obediences, because they refused to render an account of the property of the church of Wulvensy, before the bishop's adherents, as had been the custom theretofore.

A. D. 1255. Walter de Gray, archbishop of York, died. Our lord the king wished to reconcile Adomar, bishop elect, and the monks of Winchester; but the convent hoped to obtain a more desirable peace through our lord the pope. They therefore declined a reconciliation; and in this, as it turned out, they acted wisely.

A. D. 1256. Adomar, bishop elect, and the monks of Winchester, were reconciled. Master Giles, of Bridport, was elected bishop of Salisbury, and was confirmed by our lord the pope, and consecrated by lord Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, on the fifth of the ides of March [11th March]¹. Master Sewall, archbishop elect of York, was consecrated, on the tenth of the kalends of August [23d July], in his church at York. The abbot of Middleton died, and was succeeded by William of Tuanton, sometime prior of Winchester, who had mortgaged the church of Winchester to the Kaurcins for seven thousand marks, on account of a suit at law between Adomar, bishop elect, and the monks of Winchester. Wherefore the said Adomar, the bishop elect, paid over to the said Kaurcins, for the said monks four¹ marks, on one day, in London; for the moiety of which the convent of Winchester, with common consent and approbation, granted to the said elect, and to his successors for ever, the isle of Portland, together with the members of "Waynnie, Wylarum, and Helewell;" and this was confirmed both by the pope and the king. Justices in Eyre, of whom R. Wallerand was chief, sat at Winchester after the feast of St. Hilary [13th Jan.]. Adomar, bishop elect of Winchester, crossed the sea to his own country, on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul [25th Jan.], and returned on the Sunday next following the festival of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross [17th Sept.].

A. D. 1257. On the octave of the Assumption of the blessed Virgin Mary [22d Aug.], there was a convocation in London of all the bishops, before Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, to take into consideration the condition of the Church of England. The business was cut short in consequence of the war which the king was carrying on in Wales. The bishop of Exeter died, and was succeeded, in the month of February, by master Walter, archdeacon of Surrey.

A. D. 1258. The king spent Whitsunday [11th May] at Winchester, and thence proceeded to Woodstock. There was a convocation of the earls, and barons, and all the nobles of England, in parliament, at Exeter; and coming thence to Winchester, about the feast of the Deposition of St. Swithun [2d July], they remained there till after the Translation of St. Benedict [11th July]. Then William of Valence, Geoffrey, and Guy, his brothers, went into banishment; and Adomar, the bishop elect, their brother, forced by the cruelty and severity of the barons, was obliged to make his choice, either to go to prison, with one of his brothers aforesaid, according to the will of the barons, or, with his other brothers, to depart from the kingdom as an exile. On hearing these conditions, he (dreading a sedition of the barons) chose rather to cross the sea with the persons forementioned.

There broke out also at this time a dissension between our lord the king and his son Edward; but they were reconciled in the chapter of St. Swithun, at Winchester. About this time the abbot of Westminster died at Winchester. Andrew, of London, whom the said bishop elect had made prior of Winchester, resigned his priorate, on the fourth of the ides of July [12th July]; and on the same day, by a compromise, he was again elected prior, in consequence of the threats of Richard, earl of Gloucester, and other noblemen. The dedication of the church of Salisbury was on the third of the kalends of October [29th Sept.]. There was a convocation of all the nobles of England in London, on the feast of the Translation of St. Edward [13th Oct.]. While the said Adomar, bishop elect, was still alive, and residing at the court of Rome for the purpose of defending his rights, the monks of Winchester chose Henry of Wingham, bishop of Winchester, on the fifth of the nones of January [1st Jan.], by form of compromise. In the octave of the Purification of the blessed Virgin Mary [9th Feb.], there was a convocation of all the bishops and abbots of England, in London, before the archbishop of Canterbury and the nobles of England; and the parliament lasted till Lent.¹

A. D. 1259. Lord Hugh Bigot, Gilbert of Preston, and Robert Wallerand, justiciaries, came to Winchester, on the tenth of the kalends of June [23d May], when Walter of Scoteneye was torn to pieces by horses for the murder of W. de Clare, and was afterwards hung upon a gibbet. Henry de Wingham was elected bishop of London.

A. D. 1260. The king came to Winchester, on the eighth of the kalends of September [25th Aug.], and was met by a solemn procession. John de Calceto, abbot of Bury, was made treasurer of England. The aforesaid Adomar, bishop elect of Winchester, who had been consecrated bishop of Winchester, by our lord pope Alexander, died at Paris, on the eve of the feast of St. Nicolas, that is, on the fourth of December.² The church of St. Swithun, at Winchester, was laid under an interdict on the eve of the Epiphany [5th Jan.],³ by Alberic, the notary of our lord the pope; but the interdict was removed on the eve of the festival of the Conversion of St. Paul [24th Jan.]. On the day after the feast of the Purification [3d Feb.], an election of a bishop took place at Winchester; when fifty monks of the convent, and Oliver de Tracy, acting for the archdeacon of Surrey (master P[eter] de S. Omers, archdeacon of Surrey, was at that time at the court of Rome in defence of his rights, as he had been driven out by the secular power), chose, for bishop, William de Taunton, abbot of Middleton; while seven other monks of that convent chose Andrew of London their prior. This election was afterwards annulled by the pope; as we shall see presently.

A. D. 1261. Andrew, prior of St. Swithun's, by a certain submission made before Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, resigned his priorate. He appealed to the pope touching that matter, and the business of the election, and he despatched special messengers to the court of Rome, with many gifts, but all to no purpose. John, bishop of Chichester, died; and was succeeded by master Stephen, the poorest of the canons, who, as is reported, was elected out of spite to some of them. On the fourteenth of the kalends of April [19th March], the heart of Adomar, late bishop of Winchester, was carried to Winchester, and was buried, with fitting reverence, near the high altar; on this occasion many miracles shone forth.

¹ Ash-Wednesday fell upon the 26th of February, in 1259.

² The eve of St. Nicolas falls on the fifth of December, but the true date is that stated in the text, namely, the fourth of December, as is proved by the Patent Roll, quoted in Hardy's Le Neve, iii. 9.

³ A. D. 1261.

A. D. 1262. Richard, earl of Gloucester, died, and was buried at Tewkesbury. St. Richard, bishop of Chichester, was canonized. The election at Winchester having been set aside; not for anything amiss in the individual, but upon some other pretext, master John of Exeter, chancellor of York, residing at the court of Rome, was consecrated bishop of Winchester. Giles, bishop of Salisbury, died; and Walter Wyle, sub-dean of the church of Salisbury, was elected; it is said that envy had some share in this transaction. Andrew, prior of Winchester, having, against his will, resigned his priorate, through John the bishop, was committed to prison at Hyde, on account of his bad behaviour. Escaping thence by cunning and knavery, he trumped up such an artful story, that, for the merits of St. Thomas the Martyr, he was set free from fetters and from prison. In proof of which, the very links of his chain, presented by himself, along with an inscription, are kept at Canterbury by way of sport, for no one can affirm that there is anything miraculous in it. John de Chauce, abbot of Bury, treasurer of England, died.

A. D. 1263. After Easter [1st April], N. de Tracy, W. Bonquer, William of Englesfield, and Adam de Granville, justices in Eyre, sat at Winchester, plotting among themselves, and not attending to the king's affairs, but to their own. Andrew, prior of Winchester, went to the court of Rome. Roger of St. Walleric, abbot of Hyde, died. The people of Winchester made an attack upon their own townsmen and upon their neighbours, seizing the property of both clergy and laity, within and without the walls, and forcing contributions from them, masking their villany under pretence of asserting the rights of the king.

A. D. 1264. On the fourth of the nones of May [4th May], the men of Winchester rose in a body against the prior and convent of St. Swithun, and completely burnt the gate of the priory, and the gate called Kingate, with the church of St. Swithun, together with all the buildings and property belonging to the prior and convent near the wall; they also cruelly murdered some persons belonging to the priory within the boundary wall of the monastery. On the fourth of the nones of September [2d Sept.], master [Robert]¹ de Karvilla, treasurer of Salisbury, died.

A. D. 1265. Ralph, prior of Winchester, died, on the eighth of the ides of July [8th July], and was succeeded, on the twelfth of the kalends of August [21st July], by Valentine, a monk of the same church. The city of Winchester was taken by Simon de Montfort, the younger, on the seventeenth of the kalends of August [16th July]. Agnes, abbess of Winchester, died, on the third of the kalends of September [30th Aug.]. King Henry came to Winchester, on the third of the ides of September [11th Sept.]; on which day Euphemia, a nun of that church, was elected abbess, and was received by the king on the same day. The church of Winchester was laid under an interdict, on the eve of the feast of St. Nicolas [5th Dec.]; and on the fourth day afterwards the interdict was renewed. On the seventeenth of the kalends of January [16th Dec.], the city of Winchester, within and without the walls, was laid under an interdict, on account of the attack of Simon de Montford, the younger, and on the eve of the feast of St. Thomas the Apostle [20th Dec.] that interdict was renewed.

A. D. 1266. Walter de Cantilupe, died; and likewise the bishops of Worcester and Norwich. In the same year the bishops of London and Chichester were suspended from their office and emoluments by the lord Ottobonus, who, after they had appealed, crossed the sea. In like manner, lord John, bishop of Winchester, who had been suspended at the same time, set out for Rome. Master Nicolas of Ely was elected bishop of Worcester, and was consecrated on the Sunday next preceding the feast of St. Michael [26th Sept.]. Master Walter Giffard, postulated to the archbishopric of York from the bishopric of Bath, was confirmed by our lord the pope.

A. D. 1267. On the fourth of the nones of August [4th Aug.], my lord the legate arrived at Winchester, and was received by a solemn procession. On the feast of St. Oswald, king and martyr [5th Aug.], he visited the church of St. Swithun. On the seventh of the ides of August [7th Aug.], he visited the priory, which Valentine had previously resigned; he likewise appointed wardens of the priory, and to them he consigned the entire care of it. The said legate then set out for Wales, to effect a reconciliation between the prince of Wales and the king. On the nineteenth of the kalends of August [14th July], lord Edward arrived at Winchester; and departing thence for the Isle of Wight, he took it, and delivered it up to the safe keeping of his followers. On the third of the kalends of November [30th Oct.], our lord the king arrived at Winchester, and was received by a solemn procession. On the fifth of the ides of December [9th Dec.], the legate arrived at Winchester, and took up his quarters at Hyde abbey; and, after spending Christmas there with our lord the king, he went away early on the morning of the fifth day—which was the feast of St. Thomas the Martyr [29th Dec.], and laid the said abbey of Hyde and the church under an interdict, on account of a fight that had taken place between the men of the said legate and the men of the abbey; which interdict continued for four weeks.

A. D. 1268. John, bishop of Winchester, died, on the thirteenth of the kalends of February [20th Jan.], at the Roman court at Viterbo; Nicolas of Ely, bishop of Worcester, succeeded him, on the sixth of the kalends of March [24th Feb.], and was ordained by our lord, pope Clement. On the day after the feast of the Apostles Philip and James [2d May], he was accepted by the king; and on the sixth of the kalends of June [27th May], he was met at Winchester by our lord the king, in solemn procession; and, after being enthroned, he solemnly celebrated mass. On the nineteenth of the kalends of May [13th April], the lord legate held a council at the church of St. Paul, in London, when he commanded various constitutions and statutes to be observed. At the desire of the lord legate, Valentine was restored to his priorate at Winchester, on the day after the anniversary of the Deposition of St. Swithun [3d

July]; the injunctions of the legate remaining in full force notwithstanding. Master Godfred Giffard, chancellor of our lord the king, having been elected bishop of Worcester, was received by our lord the king, and was confirmed by the archbishop. On the eighteenth of the kalends of November [15th Oct.], our lord the king held his parliament at Winchester, where he appointed his son Edward to be seneschal of England: there, too, the king kept his Christmas, and appointed the said Edward warden of London and of all his castles in England.

A. D. 1269. On the third of the nones of June [3d June], John Breton was consecrated bishop of Hereford at Waverley, by lord Nicolas, bishop of Winchester. On the ninth of the kalends of September [24th Aug.], lord Richard, king of Almaine, on his return, landed, and came to Winchester. On the day after the feast of St. Michael [30th Sept.], the justices of the Forest, namely, lord R. de Clifford and his companions, coming to Winchester, sate there till the feast of All Saints [1st Nov.]. In the meanwhile other inquisitors also arrived, to hold investigations touching cases of felony and treason committed in the county against our lord the king. The body of St. Edward the king was removed from the old shrine into a new one, in the presence of king Henry, who, according to his decree, had arranged to carry the crown; but he did not do so.

A. D. 1270. A parliament of all the peers of the kingdom was held on the quinzaine of Easter,¹ to deliberate respecting the twentieths, and respecting the journey of the Crusaders—that is to say, of lord Edward, and other grandees of the realm. After a long debate, they all agreed at last to place themselves at the disposal of lord Richard, king of Almaine, so that they would all abide by his decision. In this decision, however, Gilbert, earl of Gloucester, and several others, did not concur. Whereupon the business was postponed till after the octave of St. John the Baptist [1st July]. After the octave of St. John the Baptist [1st July], nearly all the peers assembled in London to treat about the matters aforesaid. In the meantime, a personal combat took place between J. earl of Warren and Alan la Zouche, before the justices of the king's-bench in London; when the said Alan received a mortal wound, of which he afterwards died. And the said earl of Warren having, on the Sunday after the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula [3d Aug.], at Winchester, averred, on the oath of twenty-five knights, that he had not committed that act out of malice aforethought, nor in contempt of our lord the king, was reconciled to our lord the king upon the payment of twelve hundred marks. Lord Edward was at the castle of Winchester; he craved the king's permission to sail over to the continent, on his way to the Holy Land; and he came to the chapter, on the nones of August [5th Aug.], and received licence from the convent, humbly beseeching them to pray for him; and along with him were R. de Valentia, lord Thomas de Clare, lord Roger de Clifford, and several others. But, altering their minds, they went to Canterbury, and set sail from Dover, on the thirteenth of the kalends of August [20th July].¹ Our lord the king kept his Christmas in the castle of Winchester; and on the day after the feast of St. Thomas the Martyr [30th Dec.], he set out thence for London.

A. D. 1271. On the fifth of the kalends of August [28th July], the justices—lord W. de Wyntershille and others—sat at Winchester for gaol delivery, and for inquiry into other matters. On the third of the nones of January [3d Jan.], Walter de la Wyle, bishop of Salisbury, died, and was succeeded by Robert de Weychanton, dean of Salisbury, on the seventh of the kalends of March [27th Feb.]. In the second week of Lent [1—8th March], Nicolas, lord bishop of Winchester, held his visitation in the church of Winchester, and at Hide in the third week [8—15th March], and at St. Mary's abbey in the fourth week [15—22d March], and so on throughout his diocese. In the second week of Lent [1—8th March], there was a convocation of the bishops at Reading, to deliberate respecting the jurisdiction of the church of Canterbury, —whether they, the bishops, owed obedience to the chapter of Canterbury, or not. After the interlocutions, the monks of Canterbury appealed to the apostolic see, that nothing may be done to the prejudice of their church.

A. D. 1272. Our lord the king took his departure from Winchester after the Epiphany [6th Jan.], because the justices in Eyre were to sit there.

A. D. 1273. On the demise of the illustrious king Henry the Third, an assembly having been summoned at Westminster, after the feast of St. Hilary [13th Jan.], of all the prelates of England, and the other grandees of the realm; the archbishops and bishops, the earls and barons, the abbots and priors, four knights from each shire, and four from each borough, met together. All of these, in the presence of the lords Walter, archbishop of York, Roger de Mortimer, Robert Burnel, then bishop elect of Bath, who administered the government of England in the room of our lord Edward, king of England, took the oath to the said lord Edward as supreme ruler of the land, and also received the injunction respecting the loyal and stedfast maintenance of the peace of the realm. On this occasion Walter de Merton was appointed chancellor, and was ordered to stay at Westminster, as in a public post, until the arrival of the prince. It was then also resolved that there should be no justices itinerant until the prince arrived, but only in the king's bench. During this convocation, there arrived in London two nuncios from our lord the pope, who exhibited a request, addressed to the clergy of the kingdom, to this effect—that they would grant to the lord Edward and his brother, for two years, a tenth of all their ecclesiastical property, for their losses and charges in the Holy Land; and upon this point they produced and exhibited certain articles of apostolic authority, touching which they were to institute an inquiry.

¹ This is the date given by the Annals of Winchester; those of Worcester fix the date of their departure on the fourteenth of the kalends of September [19th August.]

A. D. 1274. Andrew, who had been some time prior of Winchester, having returned from the court of Rome, came to Winchester, on the sixth of the kalends of February [27th Jan.], with a strong and numerous body of armed men; and, sentinels having been placed by the bishop of Winchester in the church of St. Swithun, to prevent him from entering, on the third day he and his party made an attack, in order to possess himself, by violence, of the said priorate. Whereupon the lord bishop, having, by means of the preaching friars, asked for a truce till the following day, in order that he might more carefully consider the matter, called his adherents together from all quarters, and barricaded the church. Whereupon the said Andrew, seeing that he could not accomplish his design, withdrew early in the morning of the second of the kalends of February [31st Jan.]. But the bishop, having summoned all the clergy of the city to the chapter of St. Swithun's, excommunicated, and caused them to excommunicate, the said Andrew and all the monks of the same monastery who had given advice or aid to the said Andrew in so insolent an act. The same day he also laid the city of Winchester under an interdict; seven days after [7th Feb.], having made inquiry, by means of the townspeople, respecting those who had given advice and aid to the said Andrew at the time of the forementioned assault, the said bishop, at the pressing entreaty of many trustworthy persons, removed the interdict. But when this uproar, having spread far and wide, came to the ears of our lord the king by means of twenty-four jurates of the city, who declared that they could not govern the city nor keep it quiet, by reason of the violence and numbers of those disturbers of the peace,—our lord the king sent lord Roger de Mortimer and Nicolas Stapleton, justiciaries, to Winchester, to make diligent inquiry touching the matters aforesaid; whereupon many guilty persons were apprehended and imprisoned, but some secretly effected their escape. There was a certain archdeacon of Rochester, who had come to Winchester, as a judge in the cause of the said Andrew, and had spent some time there; when he refused to answer to seven articles that were brought against him by Roger de Mortimer, in which he was alleged to have acted against the peace of the realm, he was carried, as a disturber of the peace and a contemner of the king's majesty, to the castle at Winchester, and there detained for many days. Being set free at last, by letters of our lord the king, through the intervention of the bishops and several of the clergy, he returned home, and died¹ a few days afterwards.

In the same year, Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, taking his journey, on account of his visitation, through the diocese of Winchester, arrived at Winchester on the day after the feast of St. Catherine [26th Dec.], and there he was received with due respect, in procession, by the bishop of the place, and by the clergy and people. On the third and fourth days following, he held his visitation in the priory of St. Swithun, and on the fifth day in the abbey of the nuns of the blessed Virgin Mary in the same place, and on the third of the nones of December [3d Dec.], in the abbey of Hyde. Proceeding thence through other monasteries of the same diocese, he kept the festival of the Nativity of our Lord at Byterne, a manor of the bishop of Winchester, near Southampton.

A. D. 1275. On the eighteenth of the kalends of April [15th March], Eleonor, queen to our lord Edward, king of England, gave birth, at Windsor, to a daughter, named Isabella. In the same year, on the eve of St. Catherine the Virgin [24th Dec.], the lady Eleonor, queen of England, gave birth to a son, at Bayonne, in Gascony; and he was baptized by Walter, bishop of Exeter, and named Alfonsus, after the king of Spain, who bare him from the sacred font; and he was confirmed by the archbishop Auxican [of Ausch].¹

A. D. 1276. As the quarrel among the citizens of Winchester, which had begun many years ago, still continued, and their dissensions were made known to our lord the king, our lord the king gave orders and injunctions that they should be at unity with each other, that he might hear no more complaints about this matter. On this occasion, too, he checked his dissatisfaction, and permitted them to retain, in their original condition, all that appertained to the city. He then set out for Lutgershall and Marlborough, on the seventh of the kalends of February [26th Jan.]. On the day after, certain persons assembled, on the part of the king, and reestablished harmony among them. Whereupon they elected their mayor, and provosts; and appointed bailiffs, as they had been accustomed to do.

In the same year a dissension arose between the monks of St. Swithun's, at Winchester, and Nicolas, bishop of the same place, because nearly all the members of the convent took part with Andrew, the former prior, and strove to get him appointed to that office. Valentine, who was at that time prior, yielding to bad advice, voluntarily gave way, and resigned his priorate. Upon which the said bishop took into his own hands the manors of the priory, about the feast of St. Dunstan [19th May], and kept them until the first of August: he also removed Alexander, the sub-prior, from his office, and several others from their situations, and made Gilbert de Froylle, a monk, sub-prior. At length, when certain persons, on the part of the king, came to Winchester, together with the dean of Salisbury and a certain knight, with a view to re-establish concord between the parties, the said bishop, at their recommendation, restored the said Valentine to his former post in the priory, at Merton, on the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula [1st August]; and appointed afresh two officers—an infirmary-keeper, and a superintendent of the anniversaries. But, in process of time, the said lord bishop, wishing to exercise the power, and to practise the customs, of his predecessors, utterly deprived the said Valentine of his priorate; not, however, without reason (so it was said); and created, instituted, and enstalled, by his officer, on the third of the nones of December [3d Dec.], in the same year, John de Durevilla, a monk of the same monastery, a native of Normandy.

In this year, on the third of the ides of January [11th Jan.], at the hour of vespers, king Edward, for the first time after his return from the Holy Land, with Elenor his queen, arrived at the castle at Winchester; and on the following day, for the purpose of prayer, and to pay due respect to the saints, he visited the monastery of St. Swithun, where he was received, in solemn procession, by the bishop of the place and by the convent. And after he had spent several days there, on account of his parliament, Gaston de Biern arrived, conducted thither by lord Roger de Clifford, on the twelfth of the kalends of February [21st Jan.], who, presenting himself, by order of the king of France, before lord Edward the king, and submitting himself to the royal clemency for all the faults which he was said to have committed against our lord the king, was detained in the said castle as a prisoner, but still in honourable custody; and afterwards (that is on the first of May), was brought, by the king's orders, to London, and there set free, in full parliament, in form following:—That he must present himself at the court of the king of France, and there receive that recompence for his deserts which the same king shall think proper to appoint.

A. D. 1277. On the fourth of the ides of January [10th Jan.], on the second day of the moon's age, a thunder clap was first heard at Winchester, at midnight, which was followed by torrents of rain, although the day had been fair. During the months of February and March, too, there was an uninterrupted fall of rain.
